THE BOOK

OF THE

PROPHET ISAIAH.

OUR blessed Lord, just before his ascension, said unto his disciples, "All things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses; and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me. ... Then opened he their understandings, that they might understand the Scriptures." (Note, Luke xxiv. 44—49.) Hence we learn, that the sacred volume of the Old Testament was divided, at that time, nearly in the same manner as at present; though there is some difficulty, and not much importance, in exactly determining which books belonged to the Prophets, and which to the Psalms. The historical books, however, from Joshua to Nehemiah, must have belonged to the Prophets, in our Lord's days. Indeed all the sacred writers were prophets; and evident predictions of remote events are found in almost all the preceding books: but then, the prophetical part comes in occasionally, in the midst of other subjects: and in many instances, the prophet seems to have been led by the Holy Spirit, to foretel the most important and distant events, while he supposed himself, or at least might appear to the reader, to be discoursing on another subject. But in the division of the Old Testament, on which we now enter, prediction is evidently the principal subject; and other topicks are introduced occasionally, on account of some kind of relation which they bear to the predictions: and the prophets knew and avowed, that they were foretelling future events.—From Moses to Samuel, few prophets were raised up: "the word of the LORD was precious, ... there was no open vision:" but Samuel established the schools of the prophets, and we read of a succession of them in every age, till the close of the Old Testament. (Notes, 1 Sam. iii. 1. x. 5, 6.) They were, in general, extraordinary instructors, sometimes in aid of the priests and Levites; but more commonly to supply their defects, when they neglected their duty. They were also bold reformers, and reprovers of idolatry, iniquity, and hypocrisy; they called the attention of the people to the law of Moses, especially the moral law, the standard of true holiness; they shewed the inefficacy of ceremonial observances, without the obedience of faith and love; and they kept up and encouraged the expectation of the promised Messiah, and more fully declared "the sufferings of Christ and the glory which should follow." (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) Several of these prophets, nay, some of the most eminent, wrote nothing that we know of: others composed the historical records, which have been considered, and which contain also occasional predictions; with other books of the same nature, from which extracts only have been preserved for our instruction. But at length some of them were commanded to commit their messages to writing; and these constitute the books on which we now enter.—Tradition informs us, that the prophets, having written the prophecy, and delivered it as directed, affixed it to the door of the temple, where it continued some time, and was then taken down by the priests, and entered into their registers: but the persecutions, which the prophets generally endured, from both priests and people, render this tradition very doubtful; nor can we exactly know, in what way they were preserved. This, however, is not material: no learned man is anxious to know in what manner Homer's Iliad, Virgil's Æneis, or Tully's Orations, were rescued from the general wreck of ancient writings. They exist, and vouch their own authenticity. How much more, then, do those prophecies, which have been fulfilling for ages, and are fulfilling at this day, demand our attention by their internal evidence! In addition to this, however, the authority of both Jews and Christians, and above all of Christ and his apostles, transmits them to us as "the oracles of God."—The prophets did not teach any new doctrines, commands, or ordinances, but appealed to the authenticated records; it was not therefore, needful that they should confirm their messages, with that immense weight of publick miracles, with which the dispensation of Moses, and the gospel of Christ, were introduced. 'Their pretensions to be considered as God's appointed servants, were demonstrated by the unimpeachable integrity of their characters, by the intrinsic excellence and tendency of their instructions; and by the disinterested zeal and undaunted fortitude, with which they persevered in their great design. ... These were still farther confirmed by the miraculous proofs which they gave of divine support, and by the immediate completion of many smaller predictions, which they uttered. ... Such were ... their credentials ... to their contemporaries: and we, who, having lived to witness the ... second dispensation, can look back to the connexion which subsisted between the two covenants, have received additional evidence of the inspiration of the prophets, in the attestations of our Saviour and his apostles; and in the retrospect of a germinant, and gradually maturing, scheme

‘ of prophecy, connected in all its parts, and ratified in its great object, the advent of the Messiah. We have ‘ still further incontrovertible proof of their divine appointment, in the numerous prophecies, which in these ‘ later days are fulfilled, and still under our own eyes continue to receive their completion.—The language of ‘ the prophets, also, is remarkable for its magnificence. ... Each of the writers is distinguished for peculiar beau‘ ties: but their style in general may be characterized, as strong, animated, and impressive. ... Its ornaments ‘ are derived, not from accumulation of epithet, or laboured harmony; but from the real grandeur of its images, ‘ and the majestick force of its expressions. ... It is varied with striking propriety, and enlivened with quick but ‘ easy transitions. ... Its sudden bursts of eloquence, its earnest warmth, its affecting exhortations and appeals, ‘ afford very interesting proofs of that lively impression, and of that inspired conviction, under which the pro‘ phets wrote, and which enabled them, among a people not distinguished for genius, to surpass in every variety ‘ of composition, the most admired productions of pagan antiquity. ... The greatest part of the prophetick book ‘ ... was written in some kind of measure or verse.’ ... But, ‘ as the Hebrew has been a dead language for nearly ‘ two thousand years, we can have no power of ascertaining the pronunciation, or even the number of the sylla‘ bles. The quantity and rhythm of its verse must therefore have entirely perished, and there can be no mode of ‘ discovering the rules, by which they were governed.’ Grey’s Key.—Much has been written, concerning the different degrees of inspiration, with which the prophets were endowed: but, I own, I never found satisfaction in any discussion of this subject. Certainly the Scriptures intimate some disparity between Moses and other prophets, and several ways in which divine communications were made: and let others determine what credit is due to the rabbinical determinations in this respect. It seems enough to observe, that the credit of scriptural prophecy does not depend on such distinctions, but on internal evidence; and on the highest authority, that “ holy “ men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.” Probably none, except prophets, ever had an idea, how the illapses of the Holy Spirit came into their minds, and beyond doubt evinced their divine origin.
All the prophets were so superintended, both as to the words used by them, and the messages delivered, as to be preserved from error, and to give us the very word of God: and this is enough for our satisfaction. Many things, however, relative to this subject, will come in our way, and an opinion will be given on them, as we proceed.—It should be peculiarly observed, by every diligent student of the sacred Scriptures, how constantly and confidently the preceding history is assumed for granted, and as certainly known and believed by the people, in every part of the prophetical writings; and in what numerous instances, they are quoted as “ the Scriptures, “ which cannot be broken,” and “ the oracles of God,” in the new Testament. It would carry me much farther, than this introductory dissertation will admit, to enter into particulars: let the reader consult the marginal references, and doubt, if he can, whether the historical books, preceding the time of each prophet, were not extant and deemed authentick, when he wrote; and whether Christ and his apostles did not consider the whole as “ the word of God.”—The distinction between the greater and the minor prophets cannot well be passed over in silence, in this place: but it means no more than, that the prophecies transmitted to us of some of them, are more than those of others; but not at all of higher authority.

‘ To encourage men in searches of this kind,’ (that is, of the prophetical writings,) ‘ they will find such an ‘ harmony and correspondence between the figures and emblems, whereby the prophets point out things to ‘ come, that the careful comparing of them with each other will afford the best clue to guide the attentive ‘ reader, through the most difficult parts of their writings; and is likewise a most surprising proof, that they all ‘ wrote by the direction of one and the self same Spirit. ... As it is highly reasonable to believe, that some parts ‘ of the Old Testament prophecies reach to the end of the world; so it is reasonable to expect, that in every age
‘ Providence should open some new scene, which will give further insight into the meaning of these sacred ‘ writings. I confess I can by no means approve of the opinion of some learned men, who are for cramping the ‘ sense of the prophets, and confining them within as narrow a compass as they can; and will needs maintain, that ‘ the prophets scarcely foresaw any thing, but what was to come to pass in or near their own time. ... I must ‘ own myself puzzled, to assign a reason why God should appoint a succession of prophets, to foretel what ‘ should come to pass within the compass of about three hundred years, (for within that time most of those pro‘ phets lived, whose writings make up this part of the scripture-canon which is called by that name,) and take ‘ no notice of any other occurrences which should happen in succeeding times: ... whereas to extend the prophe-‘ tick views to the end of the world, seems much more agreeable to that description of God’s prescience, which
‘ the holy writers give us, That “ He declares the end from the beginning,” and “ his wisdom reaches from one ‘ “ end of the world to the other mightily, and sweetly does it order all things.’ So that even when the whole ‘ mystery of God’s dispensations shall be finished, it will appear that nothing was contained in them, but what ‘ God hath formerly declared to his servants the prophets, as it is expressly affirmed, Rev. x. 7. For a further ‘ proof of this assertion, I desire it may be considered that the prophecies, which foretel the visibility and univer‘ sality of Christ’s church, accompanied with perfect peace, prosperity, and holiness, cannot, with any probabi‘ lity, be said to have yet received their accomplishment; as neither have those predictions, which foretel the ‘ flourishing state of the Jewish church and nation in the latter times: and to suppose those prophecies to have ‘ already received their utmost completion, is, in my judgment, to give too great an advantage to the Jews, and ‘ in effect to acknowledge, that they never were, nor will be, fulfilled in their natural and obvious sense. ...
‘ Whereas on the other side to assert, that many prophecies relating to the Messiah, are already fulfilled in our ‘ Lord Jesus Christ; a truth which can be made out beyond all contradiction; and withal to maintain that several others concerning the same subject relate to his second coming, and their accomplishment shall usher in or accompany that his glorious appearance: I say, the observing this distinction between the different times; wherein the several prophecies, relating to the coming of Christ shall be fulfilled, effectually answers all the arguments by which the Jews support themselves in their incredulity. ... The ancient Jews, ... always acknowledged that the chief design of the prophets was to foretel the times of the Messiah: and when Christ and his apostles explained the prophecies in a spiritual and mystical sense, they interpreted them according to the received notions of the synagogue; and are never taxed, that we find, for misapplying particular texts, as if they did not belong to the times of the Messiah. ... It does not appear, that this mystical way of applying the scripture-prophecies to the times of the Messiah was even called in question; till the Jews came to engage in dispute with the Christians; and then, to avoid the force of their arguments, they found it necessary to reject the opinion of their ancestors.' Lowth.—These hints may prepare the reader for that mode of interpreting the prophetical writings, which is adopted in this publication, and may throw light on the subject.

The prophet Isaiah, on whose writings we first enter, is remarkable for the elegance and sublimity of his style and imagery; in which the best judges have decidedly given him the preference to the most admired writers of antiquity. He is equally distinguished by the plain and copious manner, in which he speaks of Christ, and the times of the gospel: on this account he has been called, The fifth Evangelist.—The book opens with sharp rebukes of the people for their idolatry and iniquity, and denunciations of divine vengeance upon them; but intermixed with encouraging intimations of mercy, and predictions of Christ. Afterwards follow various prophecies of judgments about to be executed on several nations, as well as on Judah; through all of which the reader is led to expect future deliverances and glorious times to the church of God. Then there is inserted an account of Sennacherib's invasion, and of some particulars relating to Hezekiah, which end in a prediction of the Babylonish captivity. The prophet then copiously enlarges upon the deliverance of his people from that calamitous state, in language peculiarly applicable to the spiritual redemption of Christ: at length he drops, in great measure, types and shadows, and speaks in the most emphatical language of the Saviour's person, sufferings, and glory; and of those things which pertain to the promulgation of his gospel, and the setting up of his kingdom on earth; until he closes with descriptions, which lead the mind to consider the final felicity of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked in another world. We shall find the whole book replete with instruction; especially, we shall meet with the most decisive internal evidence of its divine original, and it will reflect light on every part of the sacred volume, on which all our hopes of happiness are founded.

Isaiah is certainly one of the most difficult of all the prophets, though perhaps few are sensible of it, but they that try to explain him. ... The profoundness of his thoughts, the loftiness of his expression, and the extent of his prophecy, have made the commentaries hitherto written upon him, fall short of a full explication of his book: and he that will undertake to fathom the depths of this prophecy, is in great danger of going out of his own. This prophet seems to have been favoured, with an entire view of the gospel-state, from the very birth of the Messiah, to that glorious period, when "the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ." ... In those parts of this exposition, where there is any mention made of the Jews being restored to their own land, upon their conversion, and some other particulars relating to that glorious state of the church ... in the latter times; let the reader not judge of what is said upon these obscure subjects, as so many positive assertions, but only as probable conjectures. ... For in these, and such-like abstruse matters, ... a modest man should not pretend to be "wise above that which is" plainly and expressly "written." Lowth.

One grand reason of the difficulty found in explaining the predictions of Isaiah, (which the author likewise considers as much greater than exists in the writings of any other prophet,) is the total want of that internal chronology, and geography of prophecy, which is of so great use to the expositor in explaining the most abstruse parts of the predictions of Daniel, and the Revelation of the apostle John. Such a clue, or guide, is wholly wanting in the prophecies of Isaiah; and the times and scenes, to which the prophet calls our attention, can only be ascertained by the events which are foretold, in the most sublime and rapturous language.

CHAP. I.

The title, 1. God, by his prophet, charges Judah and Jerusalem with base ingratitude and atrocious wickedness; and describes their deplorable condition, 2—9. He shews his abhorrence of their sacrifices, calls them to repentance with promises of forgiveness, and warns them against obstinate rebellion, 10—20. He laments Zion's degeneracy and the iniquity of her princes; denounces severe vengeance; yet intimates a subsequent recovery of the nation to purity and prosperity, 21—31.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The name of this prophet, signifying 'The salvation of the LORD,' was very suitable to the subject, on which he so frequently and delightfully expatiated, and which has procured him the title of 'the evangelical prophet,' nay, of 'the fifth Evangelist.' Tradition reports that he was of noble birth; that his daughter was married to Manasseh; and that he was sawn asunder by the command of that idolatrous prince, to which the apostle is supposed to allude. (Note, Heb. xi. 35—38.) It must, however, be allowed that these traditions are very uncertain; and some think he did not survive Hezekiah: yet even in that case, he must have prophesied sixty years at least.—In general, the reader must be referred to the notes, on the second book of Kings, from the fifteenth to the twenty-first chapter, inclusive; and to the second book of Chronicles, from the twenty-sixth to the thirty-third chapter inclusive, for the state of Judah and Israel, during the term of years, in which Isaiah prophesied.—Many of his prophecies, indeed, relate to other kingdoms; but always on account of their connexion, one way or other, with the chosen race.—'The two usual ways, whereby God communicated his will to the prophets, were visions and dreams; see Num. xii. 6. In vision the inspired person was awake, but his external senses were bound up, and as it were laid asleep in a trance. ... (Num. xxiv. 16.) ... It is called vision, not from any use of the corporeal sight, ... but because of the clearness and evidence of the things revealed. ... It was sometimes accompanied with external representations.' Lowth. (vi. 1. Ez. xl. 2. Rev. xxi. 10.)—This chapter may be considered as an introductory address prefixed to the subsequent prophecies; and the title may belong to the book in general, or to the chapter in particular. It is thought by some, that this was not Isaiah's first vision, though placed as an introduction to the rest.—'The prophecy contained in this first chapter stands single and unconnected, making an entire piece of itself. It contains a severe remonstrance against the corruptions prevailing among the Jews at that time; powerful exhortations to repentance; grievous threatenings to the impenitent; and gracious promises of better times, when the nation shall have been reformed by the just judgments of God.' Bp. Lowth.

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. iv. 26—28. xxxii. 1. Ps. xlix. 1—4. l. 1—3.) The Lord, in this as in many other places, with peculiar majesty and sublimity, appeals to the whole creation, in the controversy between him and his people. He had brought them up with all the tenderness and attention of a parent, till they had arrived at full maturity; but they had ungratefully rebelled against him, and apostatized to worthless idols.—The word, rendered "brought up," generally means exalted: God had greatly exalted Israel, which exceedingly aggravated the guilt of their rebellion. (Notes, Ex. xix. 4—6, Deut. iv. 6—8. xxxii. 8—15. Ez. xvi. 9—22. Acts xiii. 16—19.)

V. 3. (Notes, Prov. vi. 6—11. Jer. viii. 4—7.) The most stupid of the domestick animals are observant of the hand by which, and the place where, they are fed, though the owner seeks only his own interest in his care of them: but the highly favoured people of God did not know or understand their immense obligations, nor consider their own true interest, which could only be secured by cleaving to him.—'The Israelites, chosen by the mere favour of God, adopted as sons, promoted to the highest dignity; yet acknowledged not their Lord and their God, but despised his commandments; though in the highest degree equitable and just.' Bochart in Bp. Lowth.

V. 4. 'They were not only wicked as their fathers, but totally corrupt, and by their evil examples corrupted others.'—Every generation of Israel degenerated, more and more, from the faith and piety of their ancestors: they were not only corrupted in their early years, but corrupters and tempters of others; a circumstance extremely affecting to those, who mark the progress of impiety. In short, almost the whole nation were estranged from the Lord, and had turned their backs on him and on his holy service; and had alienated themselves from him. (Marg.)

V. 5, 6. The wickedness of the people was become so incorrigible, that it would answer no purpose to inflict any further chastisement, seeing they would "revolt more and more? 'ye will * revolt more and more: * the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint.

6 From 'the sole of the foot even unto the head, there is no soundness in it; but wounds, "and bruises, and putrefying sores: * they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with † ointment.

7 Your † country is desolate, your cities are † burned with fire: your land † strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate, as † overthrown by strangers.

8 And † the daughter of Zion is left † as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, † as a besieged city.

9 Except the LORD of hosts had left unto us † a very small remnant, † we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah.

10 ¶ † Hear the word of the LORD, ye rulers of † Sodom; give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah:

11 To † what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD: I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of † he goats.

12 When † ye come to † appear before me, who hath † required this at your hand, to tread my courts?

13 Bring no more † vain oblations:

"more:" and what did it avail to throw away medicines on the dying patient, when they only exasperated his disease? It might therefore be proper to let them alone, till ripe for utter destruction. (Notes, Jer. v. 3—6. vi. 27—30. Matt. xv. 12—14.)—Or the sentence may mean, that they were so covered with the wounds and bruises of their former smitings, that it might be enquired, where another stroke could be inflicted: or, why they would persist in those crimes, which ensured further punishment, when they were already in so miserable a situation.—The following metaphorical description, taken from the desperately diseased or wounded condition of the body, may relate either to the corrupt state of the Jews in respect of religion; or to their calamities. In the former sense, even the princes, and prophets, or priests, (the head and the heart of the body politick and ecclesiastical,) were altogether diseased, and faint as at the approach of death; religion and justice were expiring; idolatry, impiety, hypocrisy, and every kind of iniquity, were become almost universal; the disease had been so long increasing, and magistrates and ministers had so neglected the proper means of checking its progress, that the whole body was, as it were, ulcerated, putrefying, and tending to one general mortification. (Notes, Jer. viii. 21, 22. xxx. 12—18. Ez. xxxiv. 2—6. Matt. ix. 10—13.)—The passage may be accommodated as an illustration of the total depravity of human nature, but ought by no means to be adduced as a proof of the doctrine; which it cannot be, except as the depraved state of Judah was a fact, which can on no other principles be accounted for.

V. 7—9. The prosperous state of Judah, during the reigns of Uzziah and Jotham, does not accord to the description here given: and therefore commentators have generally dated this chapter in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz: (Notes, vii. 1—3. 2 Kings xvi. 5—9. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5—8;) though it has been thought, that it might be written in the close of Jotham's reign. (2 Kings xv. 37.)—The enemy so desolated the land, that Jerusalem alone was protected from the ravages: and that city was shut up, impoverished, and left alone; so that it resembled a hut erected to accommodate the gardeners, who during a few weeks watched their cucumbers and melons from being destroyed by the jackals, or foxes, or stolen during the night. Zion, with her children or inhabitants, thus cut off from communication with the neighbouring country, resembled a besieged city, or one taken by siege, as some read it.—The original will indeed bear either sense, without altering the text: but in general, whilst any instructive sense can be made of the Hebrew text, as it now stands, it behoves us to be very cautious how we sanction those, who alter, without good authority, whatever does not accord with their views, and thus in fact give us their own opinions, instead of the "word of God." But few passages will be left, which need alteration, if we adhere to this rule: and perhaps it will be better to consider them as trials of our modesty; than by conjecture, or on dubious authority, to devise new meanings and sentences, and add them to the word of God. (Note, Prov. xxx. 5, 6.)—The LORD of hosts, the God of armies, had a small remnant of pious servants at Jerusalem, and for their sakes he preserved the nation: otherwise as their crimes had equalled, so their punishment would have resembled, that of Sodom and Gomorrah. (Notes, Deut. xxix. 19—25. Lam. iv. 6. Ez. xvi. 44—61. Rev. xi. 7—12, v. 8.)

A very small remnant. (9) 'A type of those few converts among the Jews, who, embracing the gospel, should escape both the temporal and eternal judgments, which came upon the rest of that nation, for rejecting Christ, and his messengers. This remnant are called the $\Sigma\omega\zeta\omicron\mu\epsilon\upsilon\omicron\iota$ in the New Testament. Luke xiii. 23. Acts ii. 47. Lowth. (Note, Rom. xi. 1—6.)

V. 10—15. From the mention of Sodom and Gomorrah, the prophet took occasion, with a holy indignation, to address the rulers of Judah, under the title of "the rulers of Sodom," and the citizens of Jerusalem, as "the inhabitants of Gomorrah." Many of them still attended incense is an abomination unto me :

the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with :
it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting.

14 Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth : they are a trouble unto me ; I am weary to bear them.

15 And, when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you ; yea, when ye make many prayers I will not hear : your hands are full of blood.

16 Wash you, make you clean ; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes ; cease to do evil ;

17 Learn to do well ; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow.

18 Come now, and let us reason together, saith the LORD : though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow ; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.

19 If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land :

20 But if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword : for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.

21 ¶ How is the faithful city become an harlot ! it was full of judgment ; righteousness lodged in it ; but now murderers.

to the ritual observances, in their sacrifices, and solemnities ; but their numerous oblations, though such as the law required, were vain, and their very incense an abomination : nay, the Lord was not only weary of their solemn feasts, and hated them ; but he would pay no regard to their multiplied prayers, though offered with great apparent devotion. And the reason was evident ; because they were hypocrites : they neither regarded the typical intention of the sacrifices and ceremonies, nor used them as acts of holy worship, and as a means of sanctification : but proudly relied on the form as a meritorious service : and wickedly used their pretence of devotion, either as a cloke of atrocious murders and oppressions, or as a compensation for them. Their hands were full of blood-guiltiness, of which they did not repent, and from which they did not desist. (Notes, lxvi. 3, 4. 2 Sam. xv. 7—11. Ps. l. 7—21. Prov. xv. 8, 9. xxi. 27. Jer. vi. 18—20. vii. 8—11. Am. v. 21—24. Matt. xxiii. 14.)—"The solemn meeting," or the day of restraint. "Certain holy days, ordained by the law, were distinguished by a particular charge, that "no servile work should be done therein." (Lev. xxiii. 36. Num. xxix. 35. Deut. xvi. 8.) This circumstance clearly explains the reason of the name, the restraint, or the day of restraint, given to those days. Bp. Lowth.—The great day of atonement seems especially meant. (Lev. ix.)—"Although God commanded these sacrifices for a time, as aids and exercises of their faith : yet, because the people had not faith and repentance, God detested them."

V. 16—20. This exhortation to the degenerate Jews implies, though it does not expressly mention, the mercy and grace of God through the promised Messiah ; by which they might be enabled to do the duties here insisted on, and also be accepted in doing them. Attending to these most reasonable exhortations, their guilt, though the most atrocious which could be imagined, would be fully pardoned, and their national prosperity restored : otherwise their ruin was inevitable.—The words rendered "relieve the oppressed," are translated by some learned men "amend that which is corrupted : " but perhaps they mean, "make happy such as are bitter of soul."—"The word, which is translated "reason together," signifies properly, for two contending parties to argue the case together ; but here it seems to mean the effect or issue of such a debate, viz. the accommodating their differences. So God, upon the repentance and reformation of the people, engages to pardon all that is past, and look upon them with the same grace and favour as if they never had offended : for by their "sins being made white as snow" is meant, ... the sinners themselves being thoroughly purged from guilt. Lowth. (Notes, Ps. li. 1, 2. Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. Zech. xiii. 1. 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. Rev. i. 4—6, v. 5. vii. 13—17, v. 14.) It is plain, from this and other similar passages, that legal sacrifices could not atone even for external national crimes, where public reformation was generally neglected.—This kind of reasoning by the second table, the scriptures use in many places against the hypocrites, who pretend most holiness and religion in word ; but when the charity and love towards their brethren should appear, they declare that they have neither faith nor religion. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lviii. 5—12. Jer. vii. 5—11. Ez. xviii. 28—32. Am. v. 10—17. Mic. vi. 9—15.)

Christ: but, notwithstanding all her distinguished advantages, this once virtuous matron was become an infamous harlot, to the astonishment and regret of all the true servants of JEHOVAH; and, instead of wholly adhering to his worship, she was most grievously defiled with idolatry, and was also a receptacle of murderers and robbers. Nay, the apparent religion which remained was hypocritical; dross and not silver; or at best wine mixed with water, by which it had lost its strength and flavour. (Notes, Jer. vi. 27—30. ix. 7. Lam. iv. 1, 2. Ez. xxii. 18—22. Mal. iii. 1—4.) Therefore "the LORD of hosts, the mighty One" who had so often delivered Israel, with most tremendous emphasis declared, "that he would ease him of his adversaries, and avenge him of his enemies." The expressions are taken from the uneasiness which men feel, when provoked to anger by multiplied insults, and the relief and pleasure which revenge seems to afford them. All that is discomposing and the effect of sinful passions, must be removed from our conception of the divine conduct, as thus delineated: but such language strongly marks God's abhorrence of sin, and his love of justice. (Notes, Ez. v. 13. xvi. 35—43.) He has no pleasure in the sufferings of wicked men: but, as Governor of the universe, he greatly delights in honouring his own law, and displaying his own righteous and holy character; and he will therefore avenge himself on all incorrigible transgressors.

Mixed with water. (22) 'It is remarkable, that whereas 'the Greeks and Latins by mixed wine, always understood 'wine diluted and lowered by water; the Hebrews on the 'contrary, generally mean by it wine made stronger and more 'inebriating, by the addition of higher and more powerful 'ingredients. ...The eastern people to this day deal in artificial liquors of prodigious strength, the use of wine being 'forbidden.' Bp. Lowth. (v. 22. Prov. xxiii. 30. Cant. viii. 2.)—Wine mixed with water would therefore convey the idea of wine, debased and become worthless. The Septuagint renders the clause; 'Thy vintners (καπνηλοι) mix thy 'wine with water.' The apostle uses a word from the same root (καπηλευοντες) in speaking of those who corrupt the gospel by base mixtures. (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 14—17.)

V. 25—27. The Lord did not mean so to destroy a hypocritical and wicked nation, as to leave no remnant: but he foretold for the encouragement of the pious few, that "he would turn his hand upon Zion" to cleanse her, and on the incorrigible to punish them. (Ps. lxxxi. 14. Zech.

xiii. 7. Heb.) His most tremendous judgments should be as the fire of a purifying furnace, to separate all dross and alloy of base metal from her silver; to destroy hypocrites from among her worshippers, and to make believers more holy and spiritual. (Notes, 21—24. Zech. xiii. 8, 9. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12—19.) Then judges and counsellors, like the judges raised up to reform and deliver Israel, or rather like David and other pious princes and rulers, in her first and best days, should be raised up, under whom so blessed a change should take place, that Jerusalem should be called, "The city of righteousness, the faithful metropolis." For Zion and her worshippers should be redeemed from enemies and iniquities; and new converts added to her, by the righteous judgments which had been foretold. (Note, Zech. xii. 6—8.)—'When God shall redeem Zion, 'and restore those that truly turn to him, he will make a 'remarkable discrimination between the righteous and the 'wicked; God's judgments will be visible in punishing the 'latter, and his mercy in saving the former.' Lowth.—The display of the divine justice, as well as mercy, in the way of the sinner's salvation, seems also to be referred to.—The calamities of Ahaz, Sennacherib's invasion, the distress which it occasioned, its surprising event, and Hezekiah's reformation, were accomplishments of this prediction: and so were the Babylonish captivity, the redemption of the captive Jews, and their consequent adherence to the worship of JEHOVAH.—The redemption of the spiritual Zion, by the righteousness and death of Christ, and by his powerful grace; her repeated deliverances by his righteous judgments on her enemies; her prosperity and increase under his government; and her comparative purity on earth, and perfect purity in heaven; indeed most fully accord to the meaning of this energetick language. Yet there is reason to expect a more literal and exact accomplishment of the prophecy, in respect of Israel as a nation, and the city Jerusalem, in the latter days. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xxxi. 23—26. 35—40. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvii. 24—28. xxxix. 23—29. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 28—31. The ruin of apostates, and of all the wicked, must accompany the purity and prosperity of the true church; and will come upon them suddenly, at once, and on all of them together, so that they cannot help each other. The idols, and the groves or gardens, which the Jews preferred to the worship of JEHOVAH at his temple, would shortly turn to their confusion. (Marg. Ref.—Note, lxvi. 15—18.)—The word, rendered “oaks,” probably means some trees of the ever-green species: and it was predicted that the wicked Jews should become as one of them, when being blasted by excessive heat, all its leaves fade at once; and as a garden without water, which in those hot countries must very soon be utterly burnt up. Nay, the most potent of them would become “as tow,” “and his work,” (marg.) “as a spark to set fire to it;” and thus they should burn together without being quenched. This may describe the wretched state of the Jewish nation, especially when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans; and the destruction of the idols with the idolaters, so that the nation never afterwards relapsed into gross idolatry.—‘Then both the framers of idolatry, and their devices shall perish together, however supported by secular power, or recommended by worldly grandeur.’ Lowth.—The ruin of antichristian, as well as pagan, idolatry, attended with dreadful judgments on the incorrigible idolaters, seems also predicted: but the language most emphatically describes the state of the wicked in another world; when all their idolized possessions, vain confidences, superstitions, hypocritical and ostentatious works and services, as well as their wicked works, will terminate in confusion and anguish, and aggravate their tremendous doom. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The varied, persevering, and suitable methods, which the Lord, by his ministers, employs to check the progress of impiety and iniquity, to bring sinners to repentance, and to retain his people in his worship and service; when unsuccessful, eventually demonstrate the power of man’s depravity, leave sinners more inexcusable in their crimes, and tend to manifest the justice of God in their punishment. We should therefore seek his grace to render every means effectual to ourselves and others, with earnestness proportioned to the number of our peculiar advantages: else the gospel of Christ will become “a savour of death unto us;” and the heavens and the earth will declare his righteousness in our condemnation.—Man, each man, owes his reasonable powers and valuable distinctions, to his Maker’s goodness: he is upheld by his power, and feasted by his bounty, and treated as a favoured child; yet he alone, as a monster of ingratitude, spurns the authority of his gracious Friend and Father, and behaves towards him with contempt and enmity! The dull ox and ass, (as well as the more sagacious animals,) whilst they express a kind of gratitude to the hand which feeds them, judge and condemn the human race, who know not the truths, perfections, or will of their Creator, or who do not consider their folly and criminality in rebelling against him. Where then is the man, who can justify himself before God, or even at the bar of his own conscience? If we were appointed to judge our own cause, and had matters fairly stated before us, and no part of the evidence suppressed; we should almost be constrained to take his part against ourselves: no wonder then, that at last “every mouth will be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God.” (Note, Rom. iii. 19, 20.)—But the rebellion and ingratitude of those, who are favoured with his oracles and ordinances, are peculiarly aggravated; and the impiety and wickedness of nations professing Christianity display a sottishness, and a contempt of God, equally astonishing and detestable. With what justice and propriety, then, might JEHOVAH address this favoured land, as he did Judah of old, “Ah, “sinful nation! a people laden with iniquity!” Our degenerating, from the faith, zeal, piety, purity, and patience, which marked our national character, during the progress of the reformation; into open infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness, fraud, and perjury, marks us to be “a people “laden with iniquity.” The early proficiency of large multitudes of our youth in vice and irreligion, and in tempting others to wickedness, marks them to be “children that are corrupters.” In short, as a nation, we have generally “forsaken the LORD, provoked the Holy “One of Israel to anger,” and are estranged from him. The patience of God has indeed hitherto preserved us from proportionable calamities: we hope that it is not because he has given us up as incorrigible; “seeing we “revolt more and more” in the midst both of judgments and mercies. But though it cannot be said, “Your country is desolate, your cities are burned with fire, your land “strangers devour it in your presence;” yet, were it not for a few honourable exceptions, it might be said, as to our religious character, “The whole head is sick, the whole “heart is faint.” The malignant distemper also breaks forth in every part, and pervades with dire progress, all orders and ranks of men: an impious and infidel contempt of the word and ordinances of God, appears every day more avowed: nay, even those who are maintained in affluence, to promote the cause of true Christianity, often stand forth in the opposite phalanx, or by their doctrines and examples betray her cause; nor does any one call them to account for so doing! So that the “wounds and bruises,” under which the religion of the land lies gasping, “have not “been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment.” While we seem to prosper in our civil estate, “the daughter “of Zion,” the cause of the gospel, is left as a cottage in a vineyard, and “as a besieged city,” against which the hosts of aliens encamp on every side, with proud menaces and boastings, as if they were about to swallow her up. “Except the LORD of hosts had left unto us a very small “remnant, we should have become like Sodom and Gomorrah,” in wickedness and in desolation: and doubtless the inhabitants of those cities will rise up in judgment, and condemn numbers in Britain, who are daring in their iniquity amidst so many superior advantages. (Note, Matt. xi. 20—24.)—How dreadful then must be the depravity of human nature, which grows so exceedingly wicked, under the most suitable means of becoming holy! Surely in this respect too it may be said, “the whole head is sick, and “the whole heart faint!” This evil nature is in every one of us: and no physician or medicine, but Jesus and his sanctifying Spirit, can restore us to spiritual health. Let us then, by faith and constant prayer, put our distempered souls into his hands, that “the wounds, bruises, and putrefying sores” may be mollified and bound up, and closed by his healing care. Thus alone can our ruin be prevented, and holiness and happiness be restored to our souls. Blessed be God, there is a remnant, we trust a greatly increasing remnant, (may he increase it more and more,) of true believers, for whose sake, and in answer to whose prayers, the Lord has hitherto spared us; and whose examples and endeavours may yet prevail to revive the power of godliness throughout our land. To them let us cordially attach ourselves, and join our prayers and endeavours with their's. Nor should we despair, even if we saw the rulers and inhabitants of the land generally like those of Sodom. The cause is not lost, whilst any witnesses for the truth remain, to preach, and write, and protest, and pray, against prevailing impiety and infidelity; or to oppose a holy example to the torrent of iniquity and licentiousness. (P. O. Ps. xi.)

V. 10—20.

Many are apt to think, that none except infidels and profligates are in danger of impending vengeance: but, in fact, hypocrites are at least as deeply criminal as they. Indeed "the form of godliness" has very generally been thrown aside among us, as an useless encumbrance. Yet it may be feared, that there are many, who attend places of public worship, nay, contribute largely to the expense of building and supporting them; who hear, or even preach, many sermons; who zealously profess and dispute about the great truths of the gospel; who are found stated communicants at the Lord's table, and even offer many prayers with apparent devotion; to whom the Lord may justly say, 'To what purpose are all these services? I can have no delight in them, nor you any profit from them. Who has required persons of your character and allowed habitual conduct, to appear before me, and tread my courts? I am wearied with and even loathe your worship, your sacraments, your costly and ostentatious services: affront me no more with your hateful and disgusting devotions, which are merely the cloke of injustice and impenitency. I will hear none of your hypocritical prayers; and your public fasts and solemn meetings are iniquity; for "your hands are full of blood," of fraud, oppression, and open or secret licentiousness.'—Let us then "judge ourselves, that we be not judged of the Lord." Without a contrite and upright heart, God will accept no sacrifice from us: if we allow ourselves in secret iniquity, or forbidden indulgence; or if we reject the salvation of Christ; our very prayers will be an abomination. Nor can any national regard to the externals of religion avert national judgments, so long as murder, and cruel oppression are sanctioned by law, or permitted to be perpetrated with impunity.—But, blessed be God, there is a "fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness," in which the most deeply criminal may wash and be made clean. To this sinners, of every order in society, are directed by the ministers of religion, with plain and energetick warnings and exhortations. By the grace of the gospel, the most enslaved sinner may "put away the evil of his doings from before the eyes of the LORD:" he may be enabled "to cease to do the rejection of the Jews for their iniquities and idolatries, 6—9; and of divine judgments, which would be employed to humble their pride, cure them of idolatry, and cause them to cease from confidence in man, 10—22.

"evil, and may learn to do well;" and may also find pardon and acceptance by faith in Jesus Christ. And when "faith worketh by love" of God and man, and he seeks "to do judgment, to relieve the oppressed," and to patronize the fatherless and widow, according to his station in society: this change of temper and conduct will prove him interested in all the blessings of salvation. Well then may JEHOVAH call upon us to draw near to him, that he may "reason with us;" for all his dispensations are most righteous and most reasonable. But his condescension in allowing us to reason with him cannot be sufficiently expressed; for all our conduct, and all our objections, are absurd and unreasonable in the extreme. What can be more rational, than every precept of his holy law? What more reasonable, than his call to repent and believe his gospel? If we be "willing and obedient," our sins, though of crimson and scarlet hue, will become as snow, or wool; and every blessing will be communicated: but if we continue to refuse and rebel, we must be consumed by his righteous vengeance; "for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it." 'O Lord, incline every one of our hearts to accept of thy mercy, and to live to thy glory.'

V. 21—31.

Could those, who saw the Christian church, in those pure times, when "great grace was upon all" the multitude of believers; and rulers and teachers were distinguished chiefly by their humility, disinterestedness, simplicity, patience, and purity; could they, I say, arise from the dead, and survey the whole of the professing church of Christ; and observe the ambition, magnificence, avarice, luxury, carnal policy, and sloth, of numbers who appear as its rulers and teachers; surely they would exclaim with grief and astonishment, far greater than that of the prophet, "How is the faithful city become an harlot! It "was full of judgment, righteousness lodged in it, but "now—" (P. O. Rev. xviii. 9—19.)—Alas! the silver is generally become dross, and the wine mixed with water, and horrible abuses almost every where prevail. For whilst men are seeking "every one his gain from his quarter," "loving gifts and following after rewards;" no wonder that piety, justice, and mercy are little attended to. (Note, lvi. 9—12.) But we must leave the impenitent to the judgment of "the Mighty One of Israel," who will certainly "ease him of his adversaries, and avenge him of his "enemies." And, whilst we are careful not to be found among them, let us rejoice in the prophetick assurance, that he will purely purge his church from all her dross and alloy, and furnish her with rulers and teachers, like the holy apostles and martyrs of old, that she may be called "the City of righteousness, the Faithful City." Let us pray for the hastening of those blessed times, when Zion shall be redeemed from her spiritual bondage, by the Lord's righteous judgments on every antichristian opposer; and enlarged by converts innumerable, adorned with the robe of the Redeemer's righteousness, and walking in all holy obedience before him. But believers may

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. This chapter and the two following form one distinct prophecy, or message from God to the Jews, which probably was delivered about the close of Uzziah's reign.

V. 2—5. (Notes, Mic. iv. 1—5.) "The last days," or, "the latter days," signify the times of the Messiah, by the common consent of expositors, without excepting even those of the Jews: and generally the later period of those times. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Jer. xlviii. 47. 1 Tim. iv. 1—5. 2 Pet. iii. 1—4.)—As Solomon's temple, the centre of Israel's worship, was placed upon a mountain, to which the people resorted with their sacrifices from distant places; so the church of Christ, and its instituted worship, are represented as a temple built upon a mountain. (Notes, Ez. xl. 2. Dan. ii. 34, 35. 44, 45.) The establishment of his religion, by the abrogation of the Mosaick dispensation, and on the ruins of idolatry; and the advancement of his kingdom above all the kingdoms of the earth, are here predicted, under the emblem "of the mountain of the LORD's house being established on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills." The calling of the Gentiles, the success of the gospel in the apostles' days, and especially that far more extensive propagation of it which is yet to come, are predicted under the image of "all nations flowing to this mountain of the Lord's house," as all rivers flow into the ocean. The earnestness of each new convert to bring others with him, to the knowledge of Christ, and to a life of holiness, is expressed, by the people inviting one another to "go up to the house" of God, to be instructed in his ways. (Notes, lxvi. 19—23. Jer. xxxi. 6, 7. Zech. viii. 20—23.) When apostles and evangelists, of the Jewish nation, went forth to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, "a law went forth

"out of Zion, and the word of God from Jerusalem:" for Christ is a Prince as well as a Saviour, and his word contains precepts to be obeyed, as well as truths to be believed. (Note, 1 Thes. iv. 1—5.) By the establishment of the gospel, the Lord becomes Judge among the nations, who willingly submit to his authority, and make him the arbiter of their differences: and by his rebukes and convictions, the instructions that he gives, and the grace which he bestows, he promotes peace as well as purity. If all men were consistent Christians, there could be no war: as far as Christianity has prevailed on earth, wars have been conducted with far greater humanity, than before: as far as it prevails in our hearts it disposes us to peace and love: and we may assuredly expect, ere long, such a general promulgation of the gospel, as will literally fulfil the terms of this prophecy, in the universal prevalence of peace and industry; and then war shall never more be either a science, or an occupation. (Notes, ix. 6, 7, v. 7. xi. 6—9. Ps. lxxii. 3—7. Luke ii. 8—14, v. 14. Rev. xx. 4—6.) There needs no other proof, that the grand accomplishment of this prophecy is reserved for some future period, than the consideration, that nothing in any measure answerable to such forcible expressions, has yet occurred on earth.—The prophet closes his prediction, by exhorting his people to avail themselves of their advantages, and not to reject the gospel when preached to them: for these prophecies were intended to instruct future generations.—"This prophecy will not receive its utmost completion, till the destruction of the four monarchies, (Dan. ii. 35.) and the fulness of the Jews and Gentiles are come into the church. (Mic. iv.) Yet both these prophecies may be partly fulfilled in the several advances which Christ's kingdom makes in the world, who is described as "going forth conquering and to conquer." (Rev. vi. 2.) Lowth.—"This seems to have been a maxim in interpreting prophecies, received among the Jews before Christ's time; that wherever they observed an imperfect completion of a prophecy in an historical event, which no way answered the lofty expressions and extensive promises, which the natural sense of the text imported, there they supposed the times of the Messiah to be ultimately intended, "in whom all the promises of God are yea, and amen." To prevent any misunderstanding, it may be proper likewise to take notice, that this

^a mystical sense of the prophecies is now and then, but not so fitly, called a secondary sense: not as if it were less principally intended by the prophets; but rather with respect to the time, because it is the last or ultimate completion of their predictions. Ibid.—The times of the Messiah are the times, which intervene between his coming and the end of the world.—Whether the restoration of Israel to their own land, and of Jerusalem to its pristine glory, of being the capital city of the religious world, be intended, events will shew; but certainly something far beyond the crushing of the opposing powers is meant, by men's "learning war no more." (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xix. 11—21. xx. 1—6.) 'The prophet addresses himself to those Jews of later times, that should live, when the glad tidings of the gospel were published, and exhorts them to make use of those means of grace, which God would so plentifully afford them; and not continue stubborn or refractory, as their forefathers had done.' Lowth.

Shall beat their swords, &c. (4) The prophet Joel has reversed the figurative language, in predicting the wars, by which the millennium will be introduced. (Note, Joel iii. 9—17, v. 10.)

V. 6—9. The prophet was led, from the view of the glorious times, which were at length to arrive, to reflect on the deplorable state of religion among the Jews in his days. He foresaw that the Lord was about to reject his people, and speaks to him of it as if already done: and he proceeds to assign the reasons of the divine conduct. He observes, that they were "replenished from the east," with idols, or idolaters, or necromancers; with vices, luxuries, heathenish fashions, and every thing which could minister to pride and sensual indulgence. (Note, 2 Chr. ix. 13—

21, v. 21.) They imitated the Philistines in divination and witchcraft: they took delight in the children of strangers, whom they employed and imitated; and with whom they contracted marriages: and perhaps they even educated their own children after the manner of the heathen nations. Whilst the Lord prospered them in their temporal estate, their grand object was by every method to accumulate treasure; and they multiplied chariots and horses contrary to the law. (Note, Deut. xvii. 16.)—This account of their prosperity accords very well with the reign of Uzziah; (2 Chr. xxvi. 1—15;) but he did not sanction idolatry. It seems, however, that the land was also full of idols, which the people, in the lower and higher ranks, made and worshipped secretly. In short their wickedness loudly called for divine judgments; and the prophet says, "Therefore thou wilt not forgive them," as it might more literally be rendered. (Note, xxvii. 7—11, v. 11.) 'Plenty of silver and gold could only arise from their commerce; particularly from that part of it which was carried on by the Red Sea. This circumstance seems to confine the prophecy within the limits above mentioned,' (the reigns of Uzziah and of Jotham,) 'while the port of Elath was in their possession: it was lost under Ahaz, and never recovered.' Bp. Lowth. (2 Kings xvi. 6.)

V. 10—18. The Jews were here solemnly warned to prepare for most tremendous judgments. Let them then hide themselves in those caverns, which were found in the rocks; (Notes, Judg. vi. 2, 3. Luke xxiii. 26—31. Heb. xi. 35—38. Rev. vi. 12—17;) as dismayed by the display of the majesty of God, who was coming to take vengeance on them, and to exalt his own glory and authority, by abasing them for their pride; and especially the most exalted and ambitious of them. ance would peculiarly affect the haughty, and the eminent, who were advanced above others, as the stately cedars on the lofty summits of Lebanon, or as the oaks in the forests of Bashan, or as the mountains and hills above the lowly valleys. And, whilst all their fortifications were levelled, and all those things which ministered to their pride and luxury were destroyed; their distinctions would vanish, and they would become sensible of their weakness, guilt, and misery: and by this the Lord would utterly destroy idolatry from among them.—But of what day does the prophet speak? It may be accommodated to any of those days, when God arises to execute vengeance on guilty nations. The desolations of Judah by the Israelites and Syrians, in the reign of Ahaz, (Notes, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5—8,) and the ravages of Sennacherib, might form a prelude to the accomplishment of the prediction: but the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and the Babylonish captivity, seem especially intended, when idolatry was indeed entirely abolished among the Jews. The final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the rejection and dispersion of the Jewish nation, for their opposition to the gospel, might also be referred to: and our thoughts are naturally led forward to the destruction of all antichristian enemies, which will introduce the glorious period before predicted; (Notes, Rev. xix. 11—21;) and to the final consummation of all things, and the solemnities of the day of judgment.—‘The prophets often take occasion to represent the terrors of the last day, from the particular judgments, which should befall some one nation. ... Bochart doth probably guess that Tarshish, in its primary signification, was a port in Spain, called afterwards Tartessus. But it likewise appears, (by comparing 1 Kings xxii. 48, with 2 Chr. xx. 36,) that there was a place of the same name near Ophir, famous for its gold, which Ophir the same learned person places in India. ... Ships of Tarshish signify in scripture any trading or merchant ships: accordingly here the Septuagint render the words, “ships of the sea,” as our old English translation does, Ps. xlviii. 6.’ Lowth. (Note, 1 Kings x. 22.)

V. 19—21. When God should arise “to shake terribly the land,” and the affrighted inhabitants should seek to hide themselves in caves of the earth; they would throw away their idols, even those made of gold and silver, as a useless encumbrance; and leave them in any deserted corner “to the moles and bats,” that they might flee for their lives, and escape the vengeance of the Lord. (Notes, xxx. 22. xxxi. 6, 7. xlv. 1, 2. Zeph. i. 18.)

V. 22. The Jews were prone to place an idolatrous confidence in their heathen neighbours, with whom they made alliances. Thus they relied on the Egyptians, Syrians, and Assyrians, at different times: but they and all men are here called upon, to cease from depending on mortal man, who would not be able to help them when in extreme danger, and in whose professions of friendship and fidelity no confidence could be placed. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iii. 1—9. Ps. lxii. 8—10, v. 9. cxlvi. 3, 4. Jer. xvii. 5—8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The unwearied efforts of Satan and his servants to exalt idolatry, infidelity, heresy, and iniquity, and to depress truth and righteousness, may for a time succeed, and then infidels and profligates will triumph: but their joy must be short-lived; for the cause of God shall finally prevail; all the nations of the earth shall flow into the church of Christ, and become his worshippers and servants; and all which has hitherto been done, is only an earnest of what remains to be performed in due season. But whilst we wait and pray for those glorious days, when the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of Jesus; and all their inhabitants, being humbled and changed by his grace, shall live in equity, truth, and love; cultivate the arts of useful industry; “study to be quiet and to do their own business,” and “learn war no more:” let us avail ourselves of the light afforded us, and come and walk in it. Let us remember, that when true religion greatly flourishes, men bestow great diligence, and take much delight, in “going up to the house of the LORD,” and in exciting others to accompany them: that they greatly desire, and confidently expect, that He should “teach them his ways,” in order that they may walk in them; and that they gladly receive his law from mount Zion, as their rule of duty, welcome the authority as well as the salvation of the Redeemer, and submit to his rebukes, as well as desire his consolations. And let us remember also, that the humble disciple of Christ is, in every age, a harmless and blameless, a benevolent and quiet person, who follows peace and holiness, forbearing and forgiving others, as “Christ hath forgiven him:” insomuch, that if all were of his temper, wars and violent contentions, publick or private, must be annihilated.—But, while we expect more glorious times to the church of God; we cannot but behold with deep regret the present state of the world, and of the visible church. Alas! we need not wonder, that the Lord seems in many places to have forsaken nominal Christians; when we consider to what a degree many cities and countries professing Christianity are replenished with the idolatries, superstitions, vices, luxuries, and ostentatious magnificence of the Gentiles; copy their worst fashions, and form the most unnatural coalitions with the children of strangers. Nay, if we only regard the condition of this protestant land: amidst the splendour and affluence to which we have arrived, have we not “been replenished from the east,” with every species of vice and luxury? Do we not, as a nation, so delight “in the children of strangers,” that none else can properly prepare our feasts, or our diversions, and administer to our pride or pleasure? And though our land is not “full of idols,” in the literal sense, yet it is full of idolized riches and possessions: and men are in general so occupied about their gains or indulgences, that the Lord, and his truths, ordinances, and precepts, are forgotten, or despised. Whatever may be the event of these things as to the land, assuredly God will not forgive those, who persist in abasing themselves by their lusts, and refuse to humble themselves before him; but will inflict on them the most dreadful punishment denounced in his holy word.

V. 10—22.

Alas! what can wealth and splendour avail, when the Lord arises to take vengeance on guilty nations? His awful dispensations are especially levelled against those who are haughty and lofty, to bring them low; their pre-eminence and affluence mark them out as the most distinguished prey of the rapacious; and they would then gladly compound, to redeem their lives with their choicest treasures. (Notes, Prov. xiii. 8. Jer. xli. 4—8.) But the power and indignation of the Lord are chiefly to be dreaded: and in what secret cavern will men hide themselves from his all-seeing eye? He marks out the proud, as the objects of his jealousy, and has determined, “that the lofty looks of men shall be humbled; that He alone may be exalted,” either in the submission, or the ruin, of every daring rival of his glory. (Notes, Dan. iv. 34—37. v. 18—24. Luke xiv. 7—11. xviii. 9—14. Jam. iv. 4—6.) And if temporal judgments are often so tremendous, what will be the case at the day of judgment,

“when the heavens and the earth shall pass away, and no place be found for them?” Whither will the sinner then flee to hide himself, “for fear of the LORD, and for the glory of his majesty?” Then his idolized gold, silver, and costly furniture, will appear as worthless as the mire in the street; the account to be given, of the acquisition and use of them, will burden his heart; and his iniquity committed about them will exceedingly enhance his condemnation. Happy are they who now flee from the wrath to come; who take shelter in Christ, the Rock of salvation; who are humbled before God in true repentance, and desire that God alone may be exalted in their hearts, and glorified in shewing them mercy; who willingly renounce all worldly interests and carnal connexions, and cease from dependence on men, and expectations from them, however powerful and friendly; that they may give up themselves to the Lord, to serve him in righteousness all their future days! Such persons will have nothing to fear in those terrible seasons, when the wicked shall in vain call upon the rocks to fall upon them, and hide them from the wrath of their offended Judge. Let us then make this our grand concern, and be ready to renounce all for Christ, and to venture or suffer for his sake: and let us cease from expecting help from man, or making any mortal our oracle, our standard, or our confidence; for man is not only fickle, deceitful, and vain, but his breath is in his nostrils, and death will soon deprive him of all his power to help or to harm us. Wherein then is he to be accounted of, that we should, from a desire of his smile, or fear of his frown and reproach, offend the almighty and eternal God, who alone is able to save or to destroy?

NOTES.

^x ii. 22.)—The gradual approach of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans is principally foretold; and the history of that event, with the Prophecy and Lamentations of Jeremiah, form the best comment upon it: but that destruction itself was an emblem and forerunner of the final destruction of the city by the Romans.—The prophet calls on all men to behold and observe, for “the Lord,” the Governor, “even JEHOVAH of hosts,” or JEHOVAH, the God of armies, was about to deprive Jerusalem and Judah of every stay and support; as well as to reduce the inhabitants to the greatest extremities for want of bread and water. He would speedily cause to cease from among them able commanders and valiant soldiers, active magistrates, faithful teachers and prophets, prudent and experienced counsellors, honourable rulers, expert artificers, or builders, who might fortify the city; (Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16, v. 14;) and eloquent orators who might influence the people to unite for their own defence; and their very princes should be mere children in years and want of experience. This was fulfilled after the death of Josiah, by the succession of his sons and grandson in their early youth, and by their foolish and infatuated counsels. During those feeble reigns, the people had licence to oppress each other, and all distinctions in society seemed to be abolished; so that children, and the meanest of the people, treated the most ancient and honourable with insolence and contempt. ‘The usual effects of a weak and unsettled government; when faction grows too hard for justice, and seditious men dare openly to insult those that are in authority.’ Lowth. (Notes, Prov. xxviii. 2, 3. Ec. x. 16—19.) In such circumstances, offices of trust and honour would become so burdensome, that none could be induced willingly to fill them: whilst every one would see the necessity of some persons exerting themselves to repress internal distractions, and to provide for the publick security. Yet the people would be so impoverished, that very few could bear the expense of the magistracy: so that, if any one was decently clothed, that would be deemed a considerable qualification for authority: and his brethren would be ready to lay hold of him, and almost constrain him to be a ruler, and to endeavour to repair the ruined state of the community. But every one would pro-

Or, every one would be so concerned for his present ease, and so anxious to shift for his own safety, that no one would trouble himself about the publick. For, in fact, the city and land would be ruined and desolated: because their words and works had been so daringly rebellious against the Lord, and even before his glorious eyes, in his holy city and at his temple, as if they had determined to provoke him to wrath. Nay, their proud and insolent looks, and avowed purposes of wickedness, rendered them like the abominable inhabitants of Sodom; so that they had merited the severest vengeance, and had brought their calamities upon their own head. It was therefore proper, that such persons should be encouraged: and they were here by the express command of God assured that, notwithstanding national crimes and judgments, however great and many, every upright believer would be graciously accepted and recompensed, and have the comfort and benefit of his righteousness; whilst the woe denounced upon the wicked was taking effect, and they were receiving the reward of their crimes. fluence with those who administered publick affairs;) nay, their teachers led them astray, and, by their false doctrines, and opposition to the true prophets, obstructed and destroyed the way, in which men ought to have walked. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 13.) The Lord was therefore determined to stand up, and plead his own cause, and to enter into judgment with the people; especially with their elders and princes, who were notorious for robbery and oppression.
For what could they mean, who ought to have been the support of justice, and the guardians of the poor, by enslaving, and cruelly beating, and almost starving them; so that their very countenances shewed how they were crushed, and nearly ground to powder by their exactions? (Notes, Am. v. 10—13. viii. 4—10. Mic. ii. 1—3. iii. 8—12. vi.
10—15.) ‘The words, (translated “children are their “oppressors,”) ‘may be rendered their oppressors glean

‘is used for gleaning grapes after the main vintage is al‘ready gathered, Deut. xxiv. 21. ... “They that lead

“blessed;” i. e. the false prophets, who soothe thee up ‘in thy sins, and foretel nothing but peace and prosperity.’
Lowth. (Note, xxx. 8—11. Jer. xxviii. 8, 9.)
V. 16, 17. The prophet next reproved the women of Jerusalem, especially those in superior stations. It might indeed have been expected that “the daughters of Zion” would be sober, decent, and modest in their attire, and adorned with holiness: but they resembled the wanton courtezan, instead of imitating those holy women of old who trusted in God. (Note, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. P. O. 9—15.
Note, 1 Pet. iii. 1—4. P. O. 1—7.) They walked with stretched-forth necks, to shew themselves, to gaze, and to be gazed on; and with wanton eyes, set off with artificial painting of the eye-lids, inviting the beholders to accost them. Pride and affected delicacy, nay a total want of modesty, and regard to decorum, were shewn in all their motions; whilst, after the fashion of their heathen neighbours, they wore little bells in their shoes, the tinkling of which announced their approach. ‘Some interpret this of ‘chains, like a sort of trammels put upon their feet, which ‘hindered these nice ladies from making too large strides. ...

‘But the words which describe the women’s ornaments, in ‘this, and the following verses, are of a very doubtful ‘signification, the modes of every age and country varying ‘so often, that the succeeding fashion makes the former ‘to be quickly forgotten, and the words that express it to ‘be out-dated.’ Lowth. But the Lord was determined to disgrace and expose them for this vanity and wantonness:
some loathsome disease should be sent utterly to destroy their comeliness; and, being taken captive, stript, and sold for slaves, they should experience the most shocking and distressing treatment from their inhuman conquerors.
(Notes, xx. 2—4. xlvii. 1—3. Jer. xlii. 22.)
V. 18—26. The prophet here proceeds to enumerate the various ornaments, in which his country-women prided themselves, but of which they would shortly be deprived.
(The word rendered “bravery,” implies, splendour or mag- nificence.) It is not necessary to attempt the explanation of the terms, and indeed little satisfactory can be advanced, on many articles of this very singular inventory; and nothing interesting, without an inadequate degree of labour, merely in a matter of curiosity. The fashions of those ages doubtless varied much from those of our times;
but human nature was the same. (Note, Ez. xvi. 9—14.)
The Lord was so displeased with the pride and ostentation of the females, that he joined it with the impiety and oppression of the princes, as a reason for his judgments on the land: and he declared that he would so punish them, that a loathsome smell, through disease and squalid neglect, should be substituted in the place of their costly perfumes; rent and tattered garments, instead of their beautiful girdles; sackcloth instead of their fine linen; and a skin scorched, and even blistered, by the burning sun, instead of that beauty of which they were so vain: for the forces of the Jews being utterly vanquished, Jerusalem would be levelled with the ground; which event is represented under the idea of a desolate female seated upon the earth.—‘Jerusalem is here described, as a woman bereaved of her children, and lamenting over them in this melancholy posture. And thus she was represented in a medal coined by Vespasian’s order, after the destruction of that city by the Romans.’ Lowth.—The prophet, indeed, more immediately foretels the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans: but the representation would equally suit either catastrophe. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

If men do not “stay themselves on God,” he will at length remove from them all other supports: and, as the body soon languishes and dies, from which “the staff of bread, and the stay of water,” are utterly withheld; so the soul, which has not learned to trust in God, must fall into entire misery, when separated from its worldly pleasures and possessions.—It is vain for nations to rely on able statesmen and chieftains; on valiant soldiers, prudent counsellors, or eloquent orators: for, when the Lord pleases, “he taketh away their breath, and they die,” in the very crisis when their aid is wanted; or, if they live, their wisdom, courage, or success, may vanish at once, and disappoint every expectation formed from them. And what benefit can individuals or communities expect from true prophets, or faithful teachers, whose admonitions they neglect? or from those false prophets, “who speak peace when there is no peace?” (Note, Ez. xiii. 10—16.)—The Lord has various ways of punishing obstinate transgressors: he gives up offending nations to foolish and feeble governors, and to distracted counsels; he leaves men to their selfish passions, to oppress and punish each other; and he corrects the aged and honourable, who despise him, by means of the insolence of their juniors and inferiors.—In times of heavy calamity, when little can be expected in exalted stations, except trouble and expense, men generally decline them, even though there be a prospect of doing good. For most are aware, that rulers should be “healers,” and should aim to compose distractions, and promote the publick good: yet few seek and use authority for these purposes; or choose to sacrifice personal interest to genuine benevolence. However, though one nation, city, or company of professed Christians, after another, be ruined; we have a Ruler, who is also our Brother, who has unsearchable riches, and almighty power, and immeasurable love: he is indeed “a Healer,” and has undertaken our ruined cause, and given himself a ransom for our souls: in his hand we are safe, and his true church, and every believer, will certainly obtain complete deliverance. But profession and external advantages will only aggravate the crimes of those, who sin as in God’s more immediate presence, and “provoke to be married, as few men would be left, 1: but that glorious times, for holiness, peace, and security, would follow, 2—6.

“the eyes of his glory” by their wicked words and actions. And men should remember, that their impudence and insolence in wickedness, and their daring looks, while “they declare their sin as Sodom,” will testify against them, and prove that “they have rewarded evil to themselves;” when the Lord shall denounce and execute vengeance upon them. But blessed be God, there is abundant encouragement to the righteous to trust him, and for sinners to repent and return to him. However his providential dispensations may vary, he will invariably bless his people, who shall reap the fruit of their faith and piety: and he will punish his impenitent enemies according to their works.

V. 12—26.

Our righteous Lord has always wise and holy reasons for his severest judgments, as it will be made manifest in due time:—Rulers, nobles, and teachers also, are not unfrequently ring-leaders in ungodliness, and the great promoters of wickedness in church and state: and when authority falls into hands of men destitute of piety and justice, and the instructors of the people are “blind guides,” who oppose and “pervert the right ways of the Lord,” it may be expected that he will stand up to execute vengeance. But he knows how to distinguish between the righteous and the wicked, the tempted and the tempters, and the different degrees of guilt in men’s conduct: he will judge impartially, as well as punish severely; and he will call men to a strict account for all their wealth and power, and the use which they made of them. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 14—30. Notes and P. O. Luke xvi. 1—13.) Many, indeed, who eat up the vineyard of the poor, and embellish their splendid palaces with the gains of extortion and oppression, elude human justice. But what do professed Christians mean, by beating and persecuting the people of God, and “grinding the faces of the poor?” Do they indeed intend to bring on themselves the fierce wrath of the Lord, who is the Patron and Advocate of the afflicted and oppressed? (Note, Prov. xiv. 31.)—Nor let it be thought that the Lord disregards the conduct of those females, who are chiefly remarkable for their vanity and dissipation. He watches over, and registers, all their thoughts and words, and every wanton look; and all their affected and ostentatious delicacy, the expression of their pride and self-admiration. Especially he notes with abhorrence such wantonness and haughtiness, in “the daughters of Zion,” in women professing the gospel. He does not deem these indifferent or trivial matters, as many speak of them: but he, as it were, keeps an inventory of all their ornaments; and, by his prophets and servants, protests against that fondness for external shew, and that desire of being admired and flattered, and of becoming temptations to others, which are the sources of this vanity. The profuse expense also of money, and of still more precious time, to the neglect of piety, charity, and even justice; to the ruin of families, and the subversion of all distinction of rank in society, meet his most decided disapprobation. The occasion, which these vanities afford for temptations to still further crimes, in order to support the expense of them; the violation of his holy day resulting from them; and the abominable practice of coming to places of worship, as to a theatre, on which to exhibit their vain decorations; whilst those, who should be worshipping, or hearing the word of God, are employed in admiring, envying, or making remarks on their finery: all these, and innumerable more evils arise from this contagious folly, which is far too generally tolerated in our congregations; but which will eventually eat out the life of godliness, where not opposed and protested against, as inconsistent with the word of God. Without all doubt, the more care people take to have their souls “beautified with salvation,” and to do good to their poor brethren; the less time and money will they waste in this manner. If indeed Christians are bound to “redeem their time,” “improve their talents,” refuse conformity to the world, and “to do all things to the glory of God;” surely some regard should be paid to the scriptural examples and exhortations on this subject; and “women professing godliness” should be an entire contrast to these wanton daughters of Zion, in their deportment and apparel! If any despise, or be offended by, admonitions of this kind; perhaps the Lord may in this world visit them with such disease, poverty, and calamity, as may convince them of their sin and folly. Death, however, will soon strip the poor body of all its ornaments, and bereave it of all its comeliness: then, indeed, there will be a stink instead of a perfume; and all that taste and elegance, which have been for a moment admired, will be changed for the cold grave, for putrefaction, and the consuming worm. And what will such ornaments and distinctions avail at the resurrection, and the day of judgment; when every one, without respect of rank or sex, must give an account of the things done in the body, whether good or evil? May every reader henceforth renounce such childish vanities, as well as more gross iniquities, and seek that beauty and that adorning, which will endure, brighten, and purify for ever; which, at the hour of death, will render the soul meet for the company of holy angels; and will ensure to the body a glorious resurrection, in the image and likeness of our exalted Redeemer, to be with him for ever in his heavenly kingdom.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. This verse should not have been separated from the preceding chapter, as it evidently relates to the same subject. When Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, and after it was taken, (for those times seem to be intended,) the young men were generally destroyed; (iii 25;) but the young women survived in very disproportionate numbers, and had little prospect of being married: and, as the unmarried state was generally deemed reproachful among the Jews, it is fore-told, that in those circumstances they would disregard the ordinary rules of decorum, and many of them together importunately solicit the same man to take them in marriage, that they might bear his name and be exempted from the reproach: and, that the expense might not be an objection, they would undertake to maintain themselves. (Marg. Ref.) The conduct here predicted is so contrary to female modesty, and to the aversion which women feel to share a husband’s affections, with rivals; that it strongly marks both the peculiarity of their circumstances, and the impropriety of their deportment.—Reproach, &c.] Euripides thus introduces Polyxene, when led away to be sacrificed, exclaiming, ‘Without a husband, without marriage, which it behoved me to obtain!’ (Note, Judg. xi. 34—40.)

V. 2. The Lord did not intend to destroy either the family of David, or the seed of Israel; but purposed that they should again shoot forth and prosper.—Either Zerubabel of David’s line, or Jeshua of Aaron’s line, might be called “the branch of the LORD:” and the plenty produced by the land for the returning Jews after the captivity may be foretold: but these can only be as types and feeble shadows; for the expressions are so peculiar, that they must be applied to the Messiah, and the Christian dispensation. The Messiah is repeatedly called, “the Branch:” (Notes, xi. 1. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Ez. xvii. 22—24. Zech. iii. 8. vi. 12, 13:) and this “Branch of the LORD” is altogether beautiful and glorious; or “Beauty and Glory:” (marg.) his human nature is the most excellent and beautiful production of the earth: or “the fruit of the earth” may mean, the blessed fruits of his mediation, which belong to the remnant of true believers. (Notes, xlv. 8. Ps. lxxxv. 10—13.) But not only the establishment of his kingdom in the times of the apostles; but its enlargement also, by the gathering of the dispersed Jews into the church, seems predicted. Then they will see, that the Branch which they despised, is indeed “beautiful and glorious;” and his fruit, which they neglected, truly “excellent and comely” for them. We shall have frequent opportunities of shewing that the prophets use the expression “In that day,” with a latitude thus large; for with the Lord “a thousand years are but as one day.” This phrase often denotes in Isaiah, ‘not the same time with that, which was last mentioned, but an extraordinary season remarkable for some signal events of Providence: called elsewhere by way of excellency, “The day of the LORD:”’ (Comp. ii. 11, 12. x. 20. xvii. 7. xix. 18:) just as that day denotes the day of judgment, in the New Testament, as ‘a time of all others most remarkable. (See 2 Thes. i. 10. 2 Tim. i. 12. 18. iv. 8.) ... Even Grotius ... acknowledges (in his notes on xiv. 21,) that it is usual for the prophets to pass from the threatenings that relate to their own times, to the promises which belong to the times of the gospel. ... Them that are escaped.] This may be partly understood of those, that were converted by the preaching of Christ and his apostles, and thereby escaped the vengeance which involved the rest of the nation; (See Acts ii. 40. 1 Thes. ii. 16;) but I apprehend it is chiefly meant of those Jews which shall be converted at the end of the world, (when the obstinate and incorrigible shall be destroyed,) and shall return home from their several dispersions. (Comp. xxvii. 12, 13. xlvi. 20. lxvi. 19. Ez. xx. 34—43.) Lowth.—The words plainly point at the conversion of the Jews in the latter ages of the world, and the flourishing state of the church, which shall follow it.

V. 3, 4. The Jews relapsed no more into idolatry after the captivity; and they were greatly reformed, and had much true religion among them. The daughters of Zion, also, who had thought themselves very delicate, when the Lord saw them to be very filthy, were purified by the captivity; and the innocent blood which had been shed was purged out of Jerusalem by those desolating judgments. (Notes, Ez. xxii. 18—22. xxiv. 9—14.) Yet this was only a shadow of more glorious blessings. That “remnant, according to the election of grace,” (Note, Rom. xi. 1—6,) which forms the true church, is a holy people, and they are written or enrolled as the living citizens of Jerusalem; whose names are written in the book of life, among God’s elect, to whom the promises to God’s people peculiarly belong. (See Ps. lxix. 28. Ez. xiii. 9. Phil. iv. 3. Rev. iii. 5. xxi. 27.) The phrase alludes to the registers which were kept of the Jewish tribes and families. Ezra ii. 59. Lowth.—The Jews, who embraced the gospel, in the apostles’ days, were, and the descendants of that nation who shall hereafter be restored to their place in the church, shall be, washed from the guilt and pollution of their sins; and especially from their blood-guiltiness in murdering the prophets, and in crucifying the Lord of glory. (Notes, Zech. xii. 9—14. xiii. 1. 7—9.) And this effect is produced, not merely by outward calamities, but by the Holy Ghost, rendering these effectual, as “a Spirit of judgment, and a Spirit of burning;” that is, as convincing and humbling the sinner, leading him to judge and condemn himself, and to hate and oppose his sins; and thus, like purifying fire, consuming the dross, and transforming the soul into his own holy likeness. (Notes, Mal. iii. 1—4. iv. 1. Matt. iii. 11, 12. John xvi. 8—11. Acts ii. 2, 3.)

V. 5, 6. The pillar of cloud and fire was Israel’s protection, guide, and honour, in passing through the wilderness: and it is here predicted, that God would equally take care of all the habitations of his people, as well as all their assemblies for publick worship. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 21, 22. xl. 36—48.) When he puts his glory on them, by a new creation unto that holiness, which is his own glory, (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18,) he places them under his special protection; as the splendid curtains of the tabernacle were covered by those of goats’ hair, and of badgers’ skins. (Note, Ex. xxvi. 7—14.) Thus he defends the church, and every true believer, from temptation and persecution, and from all perils in life and death. (Notes, xxv. 3—5. xxxii. 1, 2. 16—20. Zech. ii. 1—5, v. 5.)—As a prophecy this will receive a more signal accomplishment in the times predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It frequently happens, that those who suffer for their sins, are more careful to avoid outward inconveniences than to obtain forgiveness: and instead of being ashamed of their crimes, are more solicitous to avoid the reproach which arises from unavoidable misfortune, than the infamy which results from voluntary and open wickedness. But such conduct tends to indelible disgrace and increasing misery.—The Lord will not contend for ever with his church: and though it seem cut down as a tree, it will shoot forth again, and its branches shall be “beautiful and glorious:” yet all its excellency is derived from “the Branch of the LORD,” “the Only-begotten of the Father,” who is “full of grace and truth,” and is the perfection of “beauty and glory:” and the fruits of his incarnation and mediation are inexpressibly excellent and desirable, in the judgment of all those, who have begun to experience deliverance from wrath, and from the power of Satan. These are the citizens of Zion, whose names are registered in the book of life; and every one of them partakes of the Spirit of Christ, and is daily renewed into his holy image; they wash away all their guilt and pollution, in the Fountain which he has opened: every affliction serves as a furnace to purify them from their dross; and the efficacious influence of the Holy Ghost, (with which they are baptized as with fire,) gradually extirpates their lusts, invigorates their spiritual affections, and renders them holy as he is holy. In proportion as the Lord thus sanctifies believers, or any part of his professing church, he will vouchsafe them the tokens of his favour, and the comforts of his presence, in their habitations, and in their assemblies; and he will assure them of his guidance and protection, through the perils of the wilderness, “as the light of a flaming fire by

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. This chapter contains a detached prophecy, which, probably, was delivered about the same time as that in the preceding chapters. ‘The subject of ‘it is nearly the same with that of the first chapter. It is ‘a general reproof of the Jews for their wickedness: but ‘it exceeds that chapter in force, in severity, in variety, ‘and elegance; and it adds a more express declaration of ‘vengeance by the Babylonian invasion.’ Bp. Lowth.—It begins with a parable formed into a sacred song, which the prophet proposed to sing to his “Well-beloved.” JE-HOVAH is the Owner of the vineyard: but the Father reveals himself by his only-begotten Son, who is the Well-beloved both of the Father, and of every believer.
The original word for “my Beloved” occurs more frequently in Solomon’s song, than in all other parts of the Bible, at least in this meaning and connexion. (Cant. i.
13, 14. 16. ii. 3. 8—10. 16, 17. iv. 16. v. 2. 4. 9, 10. vi.
1—3. vii. 12—14. viii. 14. Heb.)—Some render the first clause, “Now will I sing to my Beloved a song of loves “touching his vineyard.” No doubt, however, Christ is meant, whether the prophet be supposed to speak in his own name to the Messiah; or the Father by the prophet thus to address his well-beloved Son. He had “a vineyard “in a very fruitful hill:” or “in a horn, the son of oil,” as it is in the original. ‘A high and fruitful hill.’ Bp.
Lowth.—The situation of Canaan, being very high, is represented by a horn, which is higher than any other part of the animal: and the son of oil, is a Hebraism denot-ing fertility; oil-olive being one of the most valued productions of the promised land. But the peculiar religious privileges of the Israelites may be intended under this emblem, as well as the situation and fertility of Canaan.

V. 2. (Notes, Ps. lxxx. 8—16. Matt. xxi. 33—46. John xv. 1—8.) The care of the Lord over Israel is here described, by expressions taken from the inclosing and cultivation of a vineyard. When he separated that nation from the heathen, made a national covenant with them, gave them laws and ordinances, and took them under his own special protection and government, “he fenced” his vineyard: the destruction of the Canaanites, and their idolatrous worship, was as “the gathering out of the stones,” which would have injured the vines. His care, in forming this church of the descendants of faithful Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and in reforming the nation under Moses, Aaron, and Joshua, before their entrance into the promised land, was represented by his planting the vineyard with the choicest vine, or the vine of Sorek. (Note, Jer. ii. 20, 21.) The temple, with its altar and worship, is intended by “the tower,” in which the husbandman might safely lodge, to watch, and be ready to tend, the vineyard. The stated ministry of the priests and Levites, the occasional ministry of the prophets, and all the means of grace, are denoted, by the wine-press, or vat, into which the juice of the grapes, when pressed out, might run. But, after all this preparation, the vineyard, instead of producing abundance of good grapes, as might have been expected, yielded only wild grapes, or poisonous berries, offensive to the smell and nauseous to the taste, yet with some resemblance of grapes: that is, hypocrisy and impiety, instead of righteousness and true holiness. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. 2 Kings iv. 39—41.)

V. 3, 4. Perhaps the Jews murmured at the judgments denounced against them: but the Lord here offered to make them judges in the controversy between him and his vineyard; as a judge, before he passes sentence, asks the criminal, what he can urge in his own behalf why he should not be condemned. (Notes, 2 Sam. xii. 1—7. Ps. li. 4.) With the manifold advantages, and encouragements to holiness, which they enjoyed, and the promises of effectual assistance contained in their scriptures, they ought to have been a “peculiar people “zealous of good works:” nor could they mention any thing, that ought to have been done for them, which

God had not done, or was not ready to do, whenever they earnestly asked him to do it. So that they could assign no reason for their wickedness, but the desperate depravity of their own hearts.—‘From this, among many other texts of scripture, we may conclude, that those may have sufficient means of grace afforded them, who nevertheless are not actually or effectually converted.’ Lowth.—This is clear and satisfactory; but the sufficient grace, insisted on by numbers, which yet by their own statement proves insufficient, is not very intelligible. Sufficient means leave no insurmountable obstacle, were the heart properly disposed; but sufficient grace properly disposes it. Neither of these, however, can be to a sinner a matter of debt, but wholly of grace.—‘What was there more to be done to my vineyard?’ This seems the literal translation: not that God had done all that was in his power, and so was disappointed when he failed of success; but that he had done all that was proper, or could reasonably have been expected. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 14—16. Ps. lxxx. 11—15. Jer. vi. 27—30. xxxvi. 1—3, v. 3. Matt. xxiii. 37—39.)

V. 5, 6. The Lord next passed sentence on the vineyard, and informed the people what he meant to do with it. He would withdraw his protection; give up the land, city, and temple, to be ravaged by their enemies; deprive the Jews of the means of grace, and leave numbers of them to mingle with the heathen: he would thus let his vineyard be overgrown with thorns and briers: nay, he would command the clouds to rain no rain upon them; he would awfully withhold the sanctifying influences of his Spirit. This was, in part and for a time, fulfilled during the Babylonish captivity; but far more exactly in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; their exclusion from the church; their long-continued dispersion, even to this day, without priest or prophet; and either without means of grace, or without heavenly influences to render them effectual. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 7. This verse gives the application of the parable. (Notes, 2 Sam. xii. 7. Ez. xiii. 10—16, v. 16.) It related to the whole people of Israel, but especially to Judah, who had been peculiarly favoured and delighted in as ‘a plant of pleasures;’ (marg.) but the Jews were so degenerated from the piety of their ancestors, that, instead of judgment and righteousness, the land was full of oppression, and the cries of the oppressed. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jam. v. 1—6.)—‘The living members of the church are called “the branch of God’s planting.” lxi. 3. ... The Jews should have been such, and had sufficient means of grace to make them so.’ Lowth.

V. 8—10. The prophet next declared, in plain language, that the vengeance of God was coming on the Jews for their various transgressions: but he so expressed himself, that he included with them all persons, of every age and nation, who should be guilty of the same crimes. He first denounced a woe upon the avaricious and rapacious, who were intent by every means on increasing their estates; not regarding who was turned out destitute from his dwelling or patrimony, provided they could ‘add house to house, and field to field;’ that they might be placed alone in the midst of the land, as sole proprietors, attended only by their vassals and dependents. But the Lord had told the prophet in his ears, privately, that ere long, many houses would be left uninhabited, especially the most magnificent and elegant; and that their estates should be almost wholly unproductive, so that ten acres of vineyard should only produce a few gallons of wine, and their cornfields yield one-tenth of the seed generally sown upon them: that is, the land would be desolated, and their estates would become of no value. (Note, Lev. xxvii. 16.)—A bath, in liquids, and an ephah in solids, were measures of equal size; and were the tenth part of a homer, which contained a hundred omers. (Tables.) ‘In vain are ye so intent upon joining house to house, and field to field: your houses shall be left uninhabited, and your fields shall become desolate and barren: so that a vineyard of ten acres, shall produce but one bath (not eight gallons) of wine, and the husbandman shall reap but a tenth part of the seed which he has sown.’ Bp. Lowth. (Notes, Jer. xxii. 13—19. Luke xii. 15—21.)

V. 11—17. The next woe is denounced against the dissolute and intemperate, who were so intent upon their excesses, that they rose early to begin them, and continued till night, inflaming themselves and their passions with wine. They likewise employed all kinds of music to render their festive pleasures more exquisite: but God and his works were not in all their thoughts; they only regarded second causes, in their prosperity; and they despised the predictions of wrath, as well as the promises of mercy, which JEHOVAH sent them by his prophets, as if he were unable to accomplish either the one or the other. (Note, Am. vi. 3—8.) The prophet therefore speaks of the approaching judgments, as if already come: the people were gone into captivity for their wilful ignorance and folly; the nobles, even the glory of the nation, (marg.) were dying with hunger, the common people with thirst. Hell, (the unseen state, including along with the grave, the place of torment to which the souls of wicked men must descend,) is introduced as a voracious monster, opening wide his insatiable jaws, and gorging his prey without measure; whilst all their glory, and multitude, and pomp, the nobles, and the plebeians, with the most jovial and sensual of them, would at once be swallowed up by it. Thus even the meanest would be brought still lower; and the mightiest abased and humbled, as to their condition and lofty looks; and God alone would be exalted and glorified, in the righteous judgments which he executed, and be adored and magnified for that display of his holiness and justice. (Notes, ii. 10—21.) Then the whole land would be either left to be occupied by the cattle alone; or be devoured by strangers, who would seize upon the waste places, which lately the luxurious Jews inhabited.—Some expositors suppose, that by “lambs” are meant the poor, inoffensive, and humble believers among them; who were rescued from oppression, and provided for, when their wealthy oppressors were utterly ruined. ‘Good men ... shall want nothing that is necessary for their support. God is often represented as a Shepherd, and his care of the righteous described by their feeding securely in rich pastures. lxx. 10. Ps. xxiii. 1.’ Lowth.

13 Therefore ^emy people are gone into captivity, ^f'because they have no knowledge: and ^gtheir honourable men are famished, and ^htheir multitude dried up with thirst.

V. 18, 19. The figurative expressions, used in describing those, on whom the next woe is denounced, are differently interpreted. “They draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-rope:” that is, say some, they labour in effecting their wicked designs, as the cattle do, that draw loaded waggons by ropes or traces; while they only obtain vanity, and draw down vengeance upon themselves. Others suppose an allusion to the making of ropes, which are industriously spun out to a great length, and then made strong by twisting many threads together. Thus men proceed from one kind and degree of wickedness to another; lengthening out and multiplying their crimes; connecting one with another, causing one to spring out of another, and strengthening the whole by wicked confederacies and infidel principles, as if their object were to become as wicked as possible. In plain language, they are persons, who defy the predicted vengeance of God, and avow their resolution not to believe or regard it, till it be executed; and therefore if he, whom in contempt they call “the Holy One of Israel,” mean to convince them, “let him make speed, and hasten his work, that they may see and know it.”—‘An evil inclination (says Kimchi on the place from the ancient Rabbins,) is at the beginning like a fine hair-string; but at the finishing like a thick cart-rope. By a long progression in iniquity, ... men arrive at length at the highest degree of wickedness; bidding open defiance to God, and scoffing at his threatened judgments, as it is finely expressed in the next verse.’ Bp. Lowth. (Marg. Ref. —Note, xxviii. 14, 15.)

Jews was supported by principles equally corrupt. They employed sophistical reasonings, to confound the distinctions between good and evil, truth and falsehood; and perverted language to give actions false names. Thus, avarice is often termed prudence, and licentious extravagance, liberality; and rebellion, impiety, and revenge, are considered as proofs of a noble spirit: whilst piety and conscientiousness are called enthusiasm, hypocrisy, preciseness, affectation, and spiritual pride. Thus men often speak, as if it were of no consequence what doctrines they believed: or as if the conjectures of presumptuous reasoners were equally worthy of regard, with the authenticated and sure testimony of God: as if ignorance in divine things were of no bad consequence, and knowledge in them, of no value: or as if those theories, which contradict the scriptures, were the effect of peculiar illumination, and those principles which correspond with them, were darkness and ignorance: and as if sweetness were only to be found in the bitter ways of ungodliness, and nothing but bitterness could be found in obedience to God's commandments. Those who commend wicked men, wicked works, antisciptural principles, and a worldly life; and run down truth, holiness, and pious persons, in this manner, evidently act from the corrupt relish of a carnal mind, and from the state of their own hearts; and because they want an excuse for their conduct, and a quietus to their consciences. (Notes, Mal. ii. 17. Matt. vi. 22, 23. Luke xvi. 14, 15.)

V. 21. Those who prefer their own reasonings to divine revelation, and their own devices to the admonitions and commands of God; who deem it prudent and politick to retain lucrative sins, and neglect self-denying duties; who despise or reject the mysteries of the gospel, and deride those who believe and preach them; or who are vain of their formal knowledge of them, but do not reduce them to practice; are evidently "wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight."—"They think themselves too wise to need any instruction, and therefore despise the admonitions of God's prophets." Lowth. (Notes, Prov. iii. 7, 8. xxvi. 13—16, v. 16. John ix. 39—41. Rom. xii. 14—16.)

its strength; but the wrath of God is here denounced against them. To defray the expenses of intemperance, as well as to gratify avarice, they took bribes to pervert justice, to clear the guilty, and to condemn the righteous; thus depriving him of the benefit of his righteousness, and treating him as a criminal. (Notes, xxviii. 7, 8. Ex. xxiii. 6—9. Prov. xxiv. 23—25. xxxi. 4—7. Am. ii. 6—8. Hab. ii. 15—17.)

V. 24, 25. On account of all these enormous crimes, and because the people had despised, and contemptuously rejected, the law of God, and his messages by the prophets; he denounced most tremendous vengeance against them, which would consume them as "the tongue of fire" does the stubble and chaff; (marg.) and waste them as the blossom withers and vanishes, when the root of the plant is become rottenness; alluding to the simile of "a pleasant plant:" (Note, 7 :) and their mangled dead bodies would be cast out and be as dung (marg.) in the midst of the streets.—The first calamities by the Syrians and Israelites, in the reign of Ahaz, may be here intended, which were so terrible, that the hills trembled: and perhaps they were attended by earthquakes. (Notes, vii. 1, 2. 4—6. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5—8.) "The mountains and the earth itself are often said to tremble at God's judgments; (See Jer. iv. 24. Mic. i. 4. Hab. iii. 10. Ps. lxxvii. 18. cxiv. 7;) which expressions allude to the trembling of mount Sinai, when God came down upon it; (Ex. xix. 18;)...and because these particular judgments are an earnest of the general judgment, when the whole frame of the world shall be dissolved." Lowth. (Notes, Ex. xix. 16—20. Hab. iii. 3—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.) The terrible attendants and effects, however, of these judgments, failed of bringing the people to repentance; and they were insufficient to appease the righteous indignation of God: insomuch, that he predicted still further and more dreadful vengeance, in that remarkable and often repeated clause, "For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." V. 26—30. This animated description seems to predict the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, rather than that of Sennacherib.—When the Lord lifted up his ensign, or gave the signal, as by a hiss or whistling sound, the executioners of his vengeance would come, with inconceivable celerity, from the most distant countries: (Note, vii. 17—19:)
being eager for the expedition, and being prospered by God himself, they would meet with nothing to retard them, and would lose no time through indolence or weariness.
As the scoffers had challenged God to make speed and hasten his work of vengeance; so God now assures them, that with speed and swiftly it shall come.' Bp.
Lowth. (Note, 18, 19.) Being fully armed for the battle, their horses' hoofs, (which were not then shod with iron, as in modern times,) should be wonderfully preserved, as if made of flint, and their chariots should run with the rapidity of a whirlwind; their rage and boldness would resemble those of lions, young or old, or lionesses, and they would meet with no effectual resistance, when they came to seize upon their prey. In short, they would be as terrible to the Jews, as the roaring of the sea to the shipwrecked mariner; who looking towards the land can see no way of escape, and who is surrounded with despair and sorrow: for every beam of hope and comfort would be enveloped in utter darkness, as the heavens are sometimes wholly covered with black and gloomy clouds. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

Whilst they, who truly love our God and Saviour, endeavour by every proper means to do good to men, they primarily seek his glory: and they discern and adore his justice in the dispensations, which disgrace and afflict those, with whom they are most intimately connected.—Such as are favoured with the word and ordinances of God, and the encouragements of his gospel, stand in a peculiar relation to him. The tendency of these advantages is to render them fruitful in good works: this the Lord requires of them, and nothing else will satisfy him: and when they bear the wild grapes of hypocrisy, impiety, and iniquity, instead of "the fruits of the Spirit," "in all goodness,
"righteousness, and truth," they are nigh unto destruction. Indeed the case is so plain, that if the fact were so stated in a parable, that self-love could be fully precluded, sinners must be induced to give judgment against themselves: and at the day of judgment, when sentence shall be given on all the workers of iniquity, the criminals will universally perceive, that every attempt to justify their conduct is entirely useless. Those excuses, by which many now pacify their consciences, will then appear futile and desperate; as they charge the blame of man's wickedness on God, and vindicate all the crimes which can possibly be committed. (Notes, Rom. ii. 4—6. iii. 19, 20.) But, as "all things pertaining to life and godliness" are proposed to us by the gospel, and we are commanded to ask what we will, that it may be given to us; the sinner's persevering wickedness will be found to arise from his enmity to God, aversion to his service, and contempt of spiritual blessings; and it will appear, that he would not consent to the mortification of his lusts by the special grace of God. So that it may with propriety be enquired, 'What more could have been done for these men, that has not been done for them?' Indeed the Lord is not bound to afford his rebellious creatures any advantages: but if he graciously vouchsafe them, and men will "rebel against the light," or take encouragement to sin from the truths of the gospel; their guilt will be peculiarly aggravated, and they may expect to be doomed to everlasting unholiness and misery. (Mark xi. 14. 21. Note, Rev. xxii. 10—12.) Nations and churches also, who abuse their privileges, may expect to be deprived of them: the Lord will "take away the hedge" of his unfruitful vineyard, "and it shall be eaten up." "He will lay it waste, that it shall not be pruned or digged; there shall come up briars and "thorns;" and he will even "command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it." Whatever delight he has taken in any company of Christians: if they, or their posterity, degenerate from that faith and purity, which once distinguished them, and become generally addicted to covet-ousness, oppression, or any other vices; we may shortly expect to hear woes denounced against them, or judgments executed upon them. Few, if any, of the descriptions of professed Christians in our land, are unconcerned in this observation: may we all be zealous and repent, and do

"the first works" of the zealous reformers from popery, that the awful sentence may not be awarded against us.

would appropriate the whole earth. But covetousness is idolatry: and it is generally attended by fraud and oppression of the poor, which God abhors; and whilst many envy the prosperous wretch, the Lord denounces an awful woe upon him. Providence may, perhaps, deprive him of his wealth, or render it a burden to him: God, however, will speedily require his soul, and then whose will all his riches be?—Nor are the luxurious and intemperate less obnoxious to divine vengeance. (Notes and P. O. Luke xii. 13—21. xvi. 19—26.) How many are there who inflame themselves with excessive indulgence, and gratify every sense, as if their only business on earth were to pamper the body, and there were no other use to be made of their time and substance! Men, engaged in such sensual courses, “regard not the works of the LORD, nor consider the operation of his hands:” the wonders of creation, providence, and redemption are alike unnoticed by them: nay, they observe not his terrible judgments, and expect not his threatened vengeance. The prevalence of such impiety and vice brings desolating judgments on kingdoms, which reduce all ranks to the most abject misery: and no tongue can express what multitudes both of the honourable from their pompous feasts, and of the mean from their licentious revels, descend into hell, “which enlargeth herself, and openeth her mouth without measure,” to swallow up the multitudes who continually become her prey. In that dreadful place there will not be so much as “a drop of water to cool the burning tongue” of those, who here “fared sumptuously every day.” But, while the impious profligates are abased to the lowest misery and contempt, “the LORD of Hosts will be exalted in judgment, and God “that is holy will be sanctified in righteousness.” In every case he will also provide for the meek and humble, and feed both the bodies and souls of his people.

V. 18—30.

Wherever we turn our eyes, it is lamentable to observe what pains men bestow in pursuing the vanities of the world, and in gratifying their lusts, and in drawing down the judgments of God upon them: and what prodigious excesses of impiety and iniquity men gradually arrive at! Every sin needs some other to conceal it, to secure the success of it, or to defray its expense. Youthful lusts lead to depredation, lying, perjury, perhaps to murder; (Notes, Prov. i. 10—19;) corrupt practices lead to infidel principles; and thus men sin away fear, shame, and remorse, till they set God at defiance by their blasphemies;

and they can be convinced of the truth of his word, only by his hastening his threatened vengeance; and then too late they know it, and become sensible of their own madness and folly. In the mean time, they continue to “call good evil, and evil good, to put darkness for light, and light for darkness, and bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter:” it is evidently the tendency of their discourse and writings, to confound the most important distinctions, and to prejudice men’s minds against the truths, precepts, and ways of the Lord: and their self-sufficiency, and the arrogant and supercilious manner, in which they behave to believers, mark them out, as exposed to the additional woe, denounced on those, “who are wise in their own eyes and prudent in their own sight.” Whilst many, in this respect, “glory in their shame;” others, of a different description of rebels, can pride themselves in being “mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink:” as if their ability, through habit or constitution, to waste the gifts of God, to inveigle others to drunkenness, and to take that opportunity of imposing on them and defrauding them, would plead an excuse for their excess! Woe be unto such men, and woe to that nation, in which they obtain authority; for it cannot be expected, that they should scruple to commit the most flagrant injustice, when their own lucre requires it. But while men thus “cast away the law of the LORD, and despise his holy word;” they become fuel for the fire of his indignation, and destroy the very root of all their own prosperity: and after he has smitten them, and their carcasses are torn in the streets, or lodged in the grave, “his anger will not be turned away, but his hand will be stretched out still,” to “destroy both body and soul in hell.”—The earth itself will indeed tremble, and flee away, when he shall summon its inhabitants before his tremendous judgment-seat. Even in this world, he will never be at a loss for instruments of his vengeance. At his signal, they will come from the ends of the earth with unabated force and speed: when he gives commission, all resistance is vain: and as we know not how soon all earthly comforts and confidences may fail us, and sorrow and despair may overwhelm us; let us diligently seek the well grounded assurance, “that when flesh and heart shall fail, God himself will be the Strength of our heart, and our Portion for ever.”

verse of this book, that Isaiah delivered some prophecies before the death of Uzziah: but he was at this time more solemnly commissioned to the prophetic office, and prepared for the proper execution of it.—This august symbolical vision of the glory of the Lord is described as made at the temple; the several interposing veils being removed out of the way: for the vision specially related to those times, when “the way into the holiest was made manifest.” ‘The Lord upon the throne, according to St. John (xii. 41) ‘was Christ; and the vision related to his future kingdom, ‘when the veil of separation was to be removed, and the ‘whole earth was to be filled with the glory of God, revealed to all mankind.’ Bp. Lowth. The Lord appeared to the prophet, “sitting on a throne,” as in a human form; for he then “saw the glory of Christ, and spake of “him.” (Notes, Ex. i. 26—28. xlii. 2—5. John xii. 37—49.) “No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath “declared him.” (Note, John i. 18.)—‘It was the unanimous sense of the ancient church, that all the divine ‘appearances in the old Testament, were made by the Son ‘of God, by whom all the affairs of the church were ordered ‘from the beginning.’ Lowth.—The “throne high and “lifted up,” seems to have been the place of the mercy-seat, over which the glory of the Lord used to appear, and where he reigned, as the God of Israel and of the whole earth: and as an exterior symbol of his Majesty, “his “train,” or the skirts of his robes, filled the whole temple.—“Above,” or rather over against, this throne, stood the Seraphim, the burning ones, the most glorious of the angelick orders, glowing with the holy flame of divine love. They stood, as employed in celebrating his praises, and prepared to execute his mandates.—Each of them had “six “wings; with twain he covered his face;” an emblem of his inability stedfastly to behold, or fully to comprehend, all the glory of the Lord, and of profound reverence and adoring awe. “With twain he covered his feet;” denoting humility, as conscious that he and his services were unworthy the notice of the Lord, or even of the other Seraphim in the presence of the Lord. “And with twain he “did fly;” representing prompt celerity and alacrity in executing the will of God. At the same time they sang aloud, responsive to each other, “Holy, holy, holy, is the “LORD of hosts.” (Notes, xxx. 8—14. Ex. xv. 11. 20, 21. Num. vi. 23—26. Rev. iv. 6—8.) This threefold repetition has, generally and justly, been deemed to refer to the three divine persons in the Trinity; and to the holiness displayed in the great work of redemption. For the Seraphim seem to celebrate the Lord’s holy hatred of sin, as displayed both in the salvation of the gospel, and in the punishment of its opposers; in which respect, “the whole “earth,” as well as the heavens, has been or will be, “filled with his glory.” (Note, xl. 3—5.)—While this solemn hymn of praise was echoed from one to another of the angelick worshippers, the posts, or pillars of the porch, of the Temple shook at every response, and the whole house was filled with smoke, or thick darkness, as when it was dedicated by Solomon. (Note, 1 Kings viii. 10—14.)

V. 5. This glorious and awful vision of the divine Majesty, and the exalted worship of the Seraphim, overwhelmed the prophet with a sense of his own sinfulness; and his humiliation was attended with great dismay. (Notes, Judg. xiii. 18—22. Job xl. 3—5. xlii. 1—6. Dan. x. 4—9. Luke v. 1—11, v. 8. Rev. i. 12—20.) If these glorious spirits thought humbly of their exalted services; what would become of him, who had presumed to speak to JEHOVAH, and in his name, with unclean and unhallowed lips? He had denounced woes on others: (Notes, v. 8—23:) but he now perceived himself liable to the same condemnation; not only for his other sins, but also as “a man of unclean “lips;” as one, who had used his tongue, (which had often spoken vain and sinful words,) in declaring the message of God, and had mixed much evil with his very worship, and prophesying. He was sensible also that he “dwelt “among a people of unclean lips,” the sinfulness of whose worship he did not fully discern, till “his eyes had seen “the King, the LORD of Hosts:” and, having measured himself by others, he never was before so sensible of his own unworthiness, and unfitness for the prophetic office, which he now feared would only end in his and their condemnation. The Septuagint translation of this verse is very striking. ‘And I said, O wretch that I am! for I am ‘pierced through; because being a man, and having unclean lips, I dwell in the midst of a people having unclean ‘lips; and I have seen with mine eyes the LORD of hosts.’ (Note, Rom. vii. 22—25.)—“Alas for me, for I am “struck dumb.” He immediately gives the reason, why ‘he was struck dumb; because he was a man of polluted ‘lips, and dwelt among a people of polluted lips; and ‘was unworthy, either to join the Seraphim in singing ‘praises to God, or to be the messenger of God to his ‘people.’ Bp. Lowth. (Note, Rom. iii. 19, 20.)—‘In these ‘words therefore he deprecates the undertaking of the prophetic office. ...What the prophet here calls “unclean,” ‘...Moses (Ex. vi. 12,) styles “uncircumcised lips;” where ‘he excuses himself from a like employment, both from ‘his own incapacity, ...and from the cold reception he was ‘like to meet with among the Israelites.’ Lowth. (Notes, Ex. iv. 10—14. vi. 12. Jer. i. 6—8. Zech. iii. 1—4. Matt. x. 19, 20. Luke xxi. 12—19, v. 15.) It, however, appears from the next verses, that the prophet expressed consciousness of guilt, as to the past, even in his worship and ministry, as well as apprehensions respecting the future.

'The altar of burnt-offerings, placed near the porch of 'the temple, where the vision appeared.' Lowth.—The sacred fire from the altar represented the sacrifice of Christ and its effects: and the live coal applied to the prophet's lips, denoted the assurance given him of pardon, and acceptance in his work, through the atonement of the promised Messiah; and the communication of divine grace, to cleanse away pollution, to kindle the flame of divine love in his heart, and to fit him for the execution of his

V. 8. The Lord would not send his message to the people by one of the Seraphim, but by a prophet like themselves: and he openly enquired, whom he should send; who was willing to undertake the service. The expression, "Who will go for us?" corresponds with several others which have been already noticed. (Notes, Gen. i. 26, 27. iii. 22—24. xi. 6—9.) 'So God speaks in the plural
'number, Gen. i. 26, which is justly thought to imply a 'plurality of divine persons. For it cannot be said with 'any probability, that God is described in Genesis, as ad'vising with, or communicating his purposes to the angels,
'which is the fancy of the Rabbins: because the history
'of the creation takes no notice of angels; and conse'quently there is no ground for interpreting any text in 'the first chapter of Genesis, with relation to them.'
Lowth.—And now the prophet, who was before "struck "dumb," or greatly dismayed, being assured of assistance and acceptance, and warmed with zeal for the glory of God, readily answered, "Here am I; send me." He would go on any message, to any person, or any whither, whatever hardship, difficulty, and peril attended it.

V. 9, 10. This awful passage is quoted, or referred to, six times in the New Testament; (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Matt. xiii. 13, 14. John xii. 37—41. Acts xxviii. 23—29;) which shews that the vision had relation to the rejection of Christ by the Jews, and their consequent calamities even to this day; as well as to the men of that generation, to whom the prophet was sent.—It is remarkable, that the verbs here are imperative; but they are not so in any quotation in the New Testament. The Septuagint also render them in the future, while many other futures, in passages not dissimilar, are rendered in the imperative or optative in that version.—Where the word of God is not made effectual, through the regeneration of the Spirit, it gives occasion to those very evils, which are most contrary to its genuine tendency. (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 14—17.) By opposing the pride, prejudices, and lusts of men, they become more outrageous; and, by producing convictions which are violently resisted, the conscience grows callous: the uneasiness thus excited drives men into excess, infidelity, or furious enmity, for shelter; and when they are once engaged in open opposition, obstinacy, and regard to worldly interests, and credit among proud and ungodly men, push them forward to the most desperate extremes. Thus the gospel is heard, but not understood: something of its nature is seen, but the glory and excellency of it are not perceived:

and men become more and more insensible both to promises and warnings; so that "their hearts are made "fat" and unfeeling, their "ears become heavy, they "shut their eyes," and the whole tends to their deeper guilt and condemnation. God frequently leaves them to this judicial blindness and hardness for their other sins, especially for resisting the convictions of their own con-sciences, and the strivings of his Spirit. (Notes, Ex. iv. 21.
vii. 13. viii. 15. xiv. 3, 4. Rom. ix. 15—21. 2 Thes. ii.
8—12.) This was the awful case of numbers in the days of Isaiah, and of still greater numbers, in those of Christ and his apostles: and the Lord, foreseeing this effect, and intending to leave the Jews to this obduracy, "lest they "should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and "understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed," or saved; commissioned the prophet to go for this express purpose. 'The prophets are said to do things, when they 'declare God's purpose of doing them. In this sense, Jere'miah was appointed of God, to "root out and destroy,
"to build, and to plant," (Jer. i. 10.) that is, to declare
'God's purpose in these matters. In like manner Ezekiel 'says, He was "sent to destroy the city," (Ez. xliii. 3.)
'i. e. to prophesy the destruction of it. So here Isaiah is 'said to harden the people's hearts and to blind their eyes;
'i. e. to declare this to be the event of his preaching;
'which prophecy should be more signally accomplished,
'when the Jews should reject the preaching both of Christ
'and his apostles. ... "Make the heart of this people fat."
'This St. John expresses by hardening their heart, (John xii. 40.) so that it becomes insensible.' (Ps. cxix. 70.)
'God is said to harden men's hearts, by those very means 'of grace, which are in themselves proper to produce a 'quite contrary effect: but withal he foresees, that meet'ing with a perverse and refractory temper, they will in the 'event make them more obdurate; and he is resolved, for 'great and wise reasons, not to hinder it.' Lowth. (Notes.

V. 11, 12. The prophet did not object to the service assigned him; or question the justice and goodness of God in the awful sentence. But he enquired how long this was to be the case. And he was answered, that this would be the case, till the cities and lands were utterly desolated, and the inhabitants carried into captivity; (Note, v. 8—10;) and this forsaking of the whole land would continue for a long time. This was verified in the Babylonish captivity; but far more emphatically in the final desolations of the temple, and of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersed and forsaken state of the Jewish nation, now for almost eighteen hundred years. (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.)

V. 13. The Lord meant, however, to preserve a remnant, like the tenth, or tithes, that were holy to him. These would return from captivity, and be converted to the truth, and devoted to him, as those holy things which were eaten in his courts by the priests. Nay, the nation of Israel, in its lowest state, would be like an oak, or elm, or any other tree, which is stripped of its leaves, lopped, or cut down: yet the trunk or root still remains, and has life in it, and will again shoot forth. Thus the remnant of believers, during and after the captivity, were a "holy seed," the substance of the nation, which shot forth again and flourished. Thus Christ especially, and with him the Jews who embraced Christianity, and were incorporated with the Gentile converts when the nation was rejected, were "the holy seed:" and thus the Jews, who shall in future generations become his disciples, are "the holy seed;" the substance of the tree, which has been lopped and cut down, but which will at length revive and flourish again more than ever. "Though there be a tenth "part remaining in it, even this shall undergo a repeated "destruction. Yet, &c." ...This passage, though somewhat obscure, ...has been made so clear by the accomplishment of the prophecy, that there remains little room to doubt the sense of it. When Nebuchadnezzar had carried away the greater and better part of the people into captivity; there was yet a tenth remaining in the land, the poorer sort, left to be vine-dressers and husbandmen under Gedaliah. (2 Kings xxv. 12. 22. Jer. xl. 12.) Yet even these, fleeing into Egypt after the death of Gedaliah, ... miserably perished there. Again, in the subsequent and more remarkable completion of the prophecy, in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dissolution of the commonwealth, by the Romans, when the Jews, after the loss of above a million of men, ...had become very numerous again in their own country, Hadrian, provoked by their rebellious behaviour, slew above half a million more of them, and a second time almost extirpated the nation. Yet, after these ...and so many other repeated exterminations and massacres of them, in different times and on various occasions, we yet see with astonishment, that the stock still remains, from which God, according to his promise frequently given by his prophets, will cause his people to shoot forth again, and to flourish.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, xxvii. 2—6, v. 6. Jer. xxx. 10, 11. xl—xliv.)—"And it shall return and be for a devouring." See also the margin.—"In it shall be left a tenth, after it is "...again eaten, or devoured."...Although God suffers the Jews to be devoured by repeated judgments, first carried captive by the Babylonians, and afterwards destroyed by the Romans: ... yet still he will preserve a remnant, (i. 9,) called here a tenth part, which holy seed shall be a seminary to preserve the nation to after times. "...The words contain in them a promise, that God will never utterly reject the whole nation of the Jews, how severely soever he deals with them.' Lowth. (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 35—37. Rom. xi. 1—6. 25—32.)—Let the reader reflect that this prophecy has been extant above two thousand five hundred years, by the acknowledgement of the Jews themselves: and, comparing it with the state of that remarkable people, in every subsequent age, and at this day; let him ask himself whether it does not prove, beyond all rational doubt, that Isaiah spake by inspiration of God.—Indeed the condition of the Jews through revolving ages, so different from that of any other nation, compared with the prophecies concerning them, both in the Old and New Testament, is a complete moral demonstration, that the Scriptures are "the oracles of God;" which is the only kind of demonstration of which the subject is capable. (Note, xliii. 14—21.)—Beyond doubt, a restoration of the nation of Israel to the true church, and, probably, to their own land, is here predicted. (Notes, lxxv. 8—10. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The discovery of the glory of God, as revealed in Christ Jesus, prepares the heart for the exercise of every grace, and the practice of every duty. Indeed, all external symbols must be inadequate fully to represent JEHOVAH's essential majesty and excellency: yet they may suit our present state, in which we "see through a glass darkly."—Though "the LORD is high and lifted up;" yet, in and through the divine Saviour, he is seated on a "throne of grace," and "the way into the holiest is now laid open." While his full glory is displayed in his temple above, his train fills the outer sanctuary: yea, he dwells in every broken heart, as in a temple in which he delights.—Every rational creature worships God, in humility and reverential fear, proportioned to the degree of his own holiness and wisdom; and this is attended with an adequate measure of fervent love, gratitude, zeal, and delight in obedience. The cherubim and seraphim, before the throne,

Ahaz and his people are greatly terrified by hearing, that the Syrians and Israelites had confederated against them, 1, 2. Isaiah is sent to assure Ahaz, that they should not accomplish their purpose; but be speedily ruined, 3—9. Ahaz refuses to ask a sign of God; and Isaiah predicts the miraculous birth of Immanuel, are so occupied in admiring and adoring the ineffable glories of JEHOVAH, that they have no leisure, or inclination, to admire themselves, or applaud one another, though indeed lovely and glorious. Satisfied with his approbation, they want no other praise: and they know, that they cannot but possess each other's love, whilst they bear the image, and concur in the worship, of the Lord: for all the self-admiration, ambition, and mutual adulation of us sinful creatures, originate from ignorance and pride, and would be annihilated by clear and abiding views of the divine glory.—The essential holiness of God reflects honour on all his natural attributes: whether he pardon or punish, he has so arranged his plan, that his hatred of sin, and love of justice, will be displayed and adored; in the cross of Christ, and by the gospel and its effects, the whole earth is or will “be filled with his glory:” and these form the most exalted and favourite themes even of the adoration of angels, who sing, “Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will to men.” (Notes, Luke ii. 8—14, v. 14. Eph. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Rev. v. 11—14.) Nor is there one of them, who does not think it an honour to worship him, who was crucified on mount Calvary; even him whom infidels pride themselves in degrading and opposing! Nay, these blessed spirits vie with each other, who shall most fervently adore the triune God of our salvation. Even to witness their holy strains, and active obedience, would be more than we sinners could endure: yet they count all beneath his worth, and undeserving of his notice. But such scenes are too dazzling for our constant contemplation: a few glimpses suffice to convince us, that “we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses as filthy rags.” (Note, lxiv. 6—8.) Nor is there a man on earth, who would not be ashamed of his most admired performances, and sink into habitual self-abhorrence, if he had a clear and full view of the divine glory, and of the worship of heaven: nay, this would be attended with despair; and he would no more dare to speak to the Lord with his “polluted lips,” if he so saw the justice, holiness, and majesty of God, as not to discern also his glorious mercy and grace in Jesus Christ. But when the atonement is understood, and by faith applied to the heart; the iniquity of our holy things is taken away, and “the conscience purged from dead works to serve the living God;” and when by the Holy Spirit, the love of his name is shed abroad in the heart; then the humbled sinner takes encouragement, and feels an ardent desire to glorify the Lord, and make known his salvation to his fellow sinners. Thus men become ready for any service, in which he pleases to employ them: and neither the sense of their own unworthiness and insufficiency; nor a view of the importance and difficulty of the work; nor a prospect of hardships and injuries in it, will deter them from any attempt, to which they judge themselves to be called in his providence; but they are ready to say, “Here am I: send me.” The love of Christ constrains them, and encourages and prepares them for labouring with diligence, suffering with patience, and bearing injuries with persevering meekness. Thus reconciled enemies are formed to be ambassadors for Christ, holy apostles and evangelists, self-denying heroical missionaries, and patient labourers in more ordinary services. Thus were formed ‘the goodly fellowship of the prophets;’ ‘the glorious company of the apostles;’ and ‘the noble army of martyrs.’ And thus Christians of inferior station are animated to improve their several talents, to “do what they can;” and “to live no longer to themselves, but to him who died for them and rose again.” (Note, 2 Cor. v. 13—15.)

as a sign or pledge of preservation to David's family, 10—16. A prophecy of judgments to be executed on the land, by the Egyptians and Assyrians, 17—25.

V. 9—13.

They, whom the Lord sends to preach his gospel, must expect in very many instances, to labour without apparent success: and even to be the instruments of rendering some of their hearers more hardened and inexcusable in their crimes, and more ripe for divine judgments; even as if they were sent upon that melancholy business: and humble resignation, to a most painful trial, becomes their duty. We should, however, persist in praying for the divine blessing on our labours: and solemnly warn men of the danger of resisting convictions, “quenching the Spirit,” and “holding the truth in unrighteousness.” And no humble enquirer after Christ need fear this awful doom; which is a spiritual judgment on those who hate the light, because they determine to hold fast their sins. Let then every one who hears or reads the gospel, watch and pray against pride and love of wickedness, and all those previous provocations, which tend to this dreadful obduracy; let none of them harden their hearts, lest God give them up to a strong delusion: and let every one pray for the illumination of the Holy Spirit, that he may perceive the glory and excellency of divine things; and for “the love of the truth,” by which alone we are secured against this dreadful danger. And whilst we read of the fate of Jerusalem, and witness the deplorable state of the unbelieving Jews; let us take warning not to imitate their crimes. Blessed be God, he still preserves his Church, for the sake of the remnant of true believers which are “the substance of it:” and however professed Christians, or visible churches, may be lopped off as unfruitful branches; the holy seed shall shoot forth; yea, “Israel” as a nation shall yet again “bud and blossom, and fill the face of the world with fruit.” May the Lord hasten that glorious time, which shall be as life from the dead to all the nations of the earth.

edly vanquished the Jews, with most terrible slaughter; but they were not able to take Jerusalem, or dethrone the family of David. (Notes, 5, 6. 2 Kings xv. 37. xvi. 5. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5-8.)

V. 2. Ahaz, though a very wicked man, was preserved because he was a descendant of David, and of that family from which the Messiah was to arise. Perhaps his enemies had formed their plan of dethroning him and destroying his race, in contemptuous opposition to the promises and prophecies of God, respecting David and his seed. (Notes, 6-13. lxv. 8-10. 2 Kings xix. 30-34.) It is probable, that this report was brought to him and his people, after the slaughter before referred to; (Notes, 1. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5-8;) and related to a second assault by the united forces of Syria and Ephraim. The terror, which was excited by this information, in Ahaz, and in the family of David, and in the people of Judah, is illustrated by a most striking simile: (Marg. Ref. e;) nor can it much be wondered at, when the success of the Syrians, and the dreadful blow already given by Ephraim alone, are considered; and when it is recollected, that Ahaz and most of his subjects were entirely destitute of faith, and well-grounded confidence in God.

V. 3. Isaiah seems to have been very little noticed by Ahaz, if at all, and perhaps could not have access to him in his palace: (Note, 2 Kings xviii. 4;) but he was ordered to meet him in a place which was pointed out to him; probably because Ahaz and his nobles assembled there, to concert measures for their defence. (Marg. Ref. g.) He was also commanded to take Shear-jashub his son with him; but the reason of this command is not mentioned. Some think it was merely because his name, A remnant shall return, was itself a sign of mercy in reserve for the Jews: others suppose that some reference was had to Isaiah's child in the prophetic sign afterwards given. (Notes, 14-16.) 'The name probably alludes to the promise made by the prophet, of the people's return from the captivity; (vi. 13;) and imports that God will never ' wholly cut off his people; but will still leave a remnant, ' to whom he will make good the promises he gave to their ' fathers. i. 9. x. 21. Rom. xi. 29.' Lowth. (Note, x. 21-23.)—The word translated "conduit," seems to mean an aqueduct, such as was formerly used for conveyance of water for the supply of populous cities.—'There were two ' pools, or lakes, which supplied Jerusalem with water: ' the upper pool, mentioned here and xxxvi. 2, and called ' Gihon, (2 Chr. xxxii. 30,) and the lower pool. (xxii. 9.)' Lowth.

V. 4. (Notes, xxx. 6, 7, 15-17. Ex. xiv. 13, 14.) Rezin and Pekah had been two destructive fire-brands, which made a dreadful conflagration; and the Jews feared still more fatal effects from their confederacy: but their successes were at an end, and they were only the "two tails" of "smoking fire-brands," which were ready to be wholly extinguished, 'which are so far from being able to ' consume any thing else, that they are almost consumed ' themselves.' Lowth. (Note, Judg. xv. 3-5.)

V. 5, 6. Rezin and Pekah intended to subjugate the whole kingdom of Judah, and to divide it between them; and to set over it another king as their vassal. "Let us "rend off a part of it for ourselves." Bp. Lowth. It is not known who Tabeal was. The frequent mention of the house of David, and the sign afterwards given, indicate that they designed to destroy that family. (Note, 2.)

V. 7-9. Damascus was the capital of Syria; and that kingdom had arrived at its height of prosperity under Rezin, and would thenceforth decline: and Ephraim, or the kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital, was more prosperous under Pekah, than it would ever afterwards be; so that in the space of sixty-five years, it would be so ruined, as to be no more a people. It is computed to have been sixty-five years from this prediction, to the time when Esarhaddon carried away captive the last remains of the Israelites, about the twenty-second year of Manasseh's reign. But the exact time, in which Esarhaddon carried away the remains of Israel, is not easily ascertained: much less can it be satisfactorily shewn in what year of his reign Manasseh was carried to Babylon. (Notes, 2 Kings xvii. 24. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11. Ezra iv. 1. 2. 10.) There can, however, be no doubt, that Ephraim ceased to be a people before, and very little before, the end of the sixty-fifth year after this prophecy was delivered. It was therefore absolutely determined, that Syria and Israel would never subjugate Judah: yet, unless Ahaz and his family and subjects believed the word of God, and depended on him for protection, they could not be established in prosperity, or secured from perils and terrors, similar to those with which they were at this time agitated. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 14—19. Rom. xi. 16—21.) "Though the head of Syria be Damascus, and the head of Damascus, Rezin; and the head of Ephraim be Samaria, and the head of Samaria, Remaliah's son: yet within threescore and five years, Ephraim shall be broken, that he be no more a people." Dr. Jubb in Bp. Lowth. This rendering supposes that a transposition in the order of the several clauses has taken place, of which the Bishop gives a very probable account. But as the meaning is still the same, it is not necessary to dwell on it.

V. 10—12. Ahaz did not properly regard the message from God, delivered to him by the prophet; he was therefore by an additional address from God required to ask a sign for the confirmation of it. 'A sign wrought is a miracle for the confirmation of some message or promise delivered from God. See Ex. iv. 8. Judg. vi. 17. Is. xxxviii. 22. This was usually wrought presently: but sometimes a thing future, where the event is remarkable, is proposed as the sign. See also Ex. iii. 12. 1 Sam. ii. 34. Jer. xliii. 8—10.' Lowth. And, as a proof that Isaiah spake by divine authority, he was allowed to choose one from the depth beneath, on earth, or in the grave; or, if that would be more satisfactory, (according to the prevailing opinion of the Jews,) he might ask a sign from heaven. (Note, Matt. xvi. 1—4.) But he, (probably assenting in a general way to the promise which had been given, and perhaps not desiring any further intercourse with the prophet, lest he should reprove him for his sins;) refused to ask a miraculous sign, avowing that he would not, without necessity, put the power and truth of God to the trial, or presumptuously demand his extraordinary interposition. (Marg. Ref. u.) He seems to have made some shew of piety, but to have acted wholly under the influence of unbelief, and alienation from God.

V. 13. (Note, 2.) Ahaz was the representative of the house of David, though utterly unlike his pious ancestor; and his obstinate rebellion and unbelief not only wearied out the prophets and servants of God, which was no light matter, whatever he thought of it; but he was about to weary out the patience of God, to his own ruin; though house of David; 'Is it a small thing y for you 'to weary men; but 'a will ye weary my God also?

V. 14. The Lord 'shall give it unasked, and such a 'sign, as could not enter into your thoughts to desire. 'This shews that the promised sign was an extraordinary 'miracle, the immediate work of God, such as a son of a 'virgin is, which therefore must be the genuine sense or 'the ... words. ... The Hebrew word (עַלְמָה) most properly signifies a virgin, and so it is translated here by all 'the ancient interpreters; and is never once used in the 'Scripture in any other sense, as several learned men have 'proved, against the pretensions of the modern Jews. ... 'The primary signification of the word ... is, hid or concealed: 'from whence it is taken to signify a virgin, because of the 'custom of the eastern countries to keep their virgins 'concealed from the view of men.' Lowth.—That the reader may judge of this for himself, I shall point out all the texts in which this word is used in Scripture. (Gen. xxiv. 43. Ex. ii. 8. Ps. lxviii. 26. Prov. xxx. 19. Can. i. 3. vi. 8. Heb.)—'Christ is called "the Seed of the woman," by way 'of distinction, (Gen. iii. 14,) as not to be born in the 'ordinary way of generation.' Lowth.—'The prophecy is 'introduced in so solemn a manner; the sign is so marked, 'as a sign selected and given by God himself, after Ahaz had 'rejected the offer of any sign of his own choosing, out of 'the whole compass of nature; the terms of the prophecy 'are so peculiar, and the name of the child so expressive, 'containing in them much more than the circumstances 'of the birth of a common child required, or even admitted; that we may easily suppose, that in minds prepared 'by the expectation of a great Deliverer to spring from the 'house of David, they raised hopes far beyond what the 'present occasion suggested; especially when it was found, 'that in the subsequent prophecy, delivered immediately 'afterward, this child, called IMMANUEL, is treated as the 'Lord and Prince of the land of Judah. Who could this 'be other than the heir of the throne of David? under 'which character a great and even a divine person had 'been promised. ... St. Matthew, therefore, in applying 'this prophecy to the birth of Christ ... takes it in its 'strictest, clearest, and most important sense; and applies 'it according to the original design and principal intention 'of the prophet.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, viii. 6—10. Mic. v. 3, 4, v. 3.)—'Would it not be very unnatural to suppose, that the prophets have been entirely silent concerning this most remarkable sign of the Messiah, (viz. 'his being born of a virgin,) insomuch that an evangelist 'should be obliged to accommodate to this singular circumstance, a passage, which originally had no reference to 'the Messiah?' Granville Sharp.—'Thus we are to ‘understand the Messiah’s being called IMMANUEL; i. e. ‘being really what that name imports, ... GOD WITH US; ‘being both properly and truly God, and called so, ix. 6, ‘and also living or dwelling with us men.’ Lowth.—GOD WITH US; ‘which name can agree to none, but to ‘him, who is both God and man.’ (Notes, ix. 6, 7. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6.)—The passage cannot be made to accord to any events of those times, as if it meant, ‘that one, who ‘was at that time a virgin, should be married, and bear a ‘son.’ The application of the name Immanuel to one who was the governor of the land, (viii. 8,) can comport with none but the reigning king, or the heir-apparent; but Hezekiah was born before his father Ahaz came to the throne; so that he cannot be meant: and to whom else can the several particulars be made to accord? We can therefore admit of no interpretation, (or even accommodation,) of the prophecy, except that given by the Evangelist, (Notes, Matt. i. 22, 23,) ‘that a virgin of the house of David should miraculously conceive, and bear a son, who should be known to the church in all succeeding ages, as “Immanuel, God with us;” “God manifest “in the flesh,” and become our Brother and Saviour. This event is predicted as a Sign, a most extraordinary fact, a most signal interposition of Omnipotence. This virgin’s Son would be called by this name, as Solomon was called Jedidiah: (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25:) not that he should have no other name, or be commonly addressed by that name; but as it would properly belong to him, and he would be what that name signified. This sign was given to faith, and would encourage believers alone; for it would assure them, that no designs formed to destroy the family of David could be successful, as such a Blessing was in it. (Notes, lxv. 8—10. Ex. iii. 12. Jer. xxxi. 21, 22, v. 22. Mic. v. 2.)

V. 15. Though this child should be miraculously conceived, and be properly called IMMANUEL; yet he would grow up like other children, by the use of the diet customary in those countries, in times of peace especially, till, or rather when, his faculties were unfolded, and he became of age to distinguish between good and evil; and then, unlike other children, he would uniformly “refuse “the evil and choose the good.”—I confess that I am singular, or nearly so, in supposing this language to mean any thing more, than the capacity of distinguishing between good and evil: but, as all other children, when left to themselves, are without exception disposed “to choose “the evil and refuse the good,” decidedly preferring sin to holiness; and as Immanuel, that “holy child,” no sooner exercised the rational faculties of his human nature, than he, (and he alone,) perfectly used them in a holy manner; I must be of opinion, that this singular case was intended by the sacred writer, or rather by the Holy Spirit, who inspired him to use these peculiar expressions. (Marg. Ref. e.)

V. 16. There is very great difficulty in making out the connexion between this and the preceding verses; which is the case in some of the most remarkable predictions of

Scripture: for the Lord seems purposely to cast an obscurity on them, as a trial of our humility; and to prove, whether we will receive and profit by what is obvious, though we cannot satisfactorily solve every difficulty; or whether we will proudly reject the whole on that account. Some suppose, that by this child, the prophet meant his own son Shear-jashub, who stood by him: (Note, 3:) but this is not natural; and it may be questioned, whether the expression, “shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the “good,” could properly be applied to him. Others think that the prophet meant, that in less time than would be required, after the birth of the Virgin’s Son, for his attaining to this capacity, (that is, within two or three years,) the dreaded enemies of Judah would perish. The land of Israel must, on this interpretation, be exclusively meant, as the land which Ahaz dreaded and abhorred, for one land alone is spoken of; and “both her kings” must denote Pekah and his ally, Rezin, king of Syria; for the former was soon after cut off by Hoshea, and the latter by Tiglath-pilezer. (Notes, viii. 1—4. 2 Kings xv. 29, 30. xvi. 10—16.)—But some have supposed, that the whole of the promised land was intended, and that the termination of regal authority, both in Israel and Judah, before the time that Immanuel should “know to refuse the evil and choose the “good,” was predicted.—‘Before this child can know ‘good from evil, this land, ... which thou art so solicitous ‘about, ... shall be bereaved of both her kings; by which, ‘we think ought to be understood, not the kings of Syria ‘and Israel; for the former could not be called her (Canaan’s) king, and the latter had but a share in it at best: ‘but the kings of Israel and Judah; as it really was before ‘the coming of the Messiah.’ Universal History. The clause may be rendered, “the land by,” or concerning, “which thou art disquieted:” and both the dread of Israel, and anxiety about Judah, disquieted Ahaz; and were to him as thorns or goads to keep him awake; (which the word may signify:) and no doubt the word king is often used for a succession of kings in prophetic language. Now it is very remarkable, that Herod the great, the last who could be called “the king” either of Judah or Israel, lived till after Immanuel’s birth, but died while he was yet an infant: and then, Shiloh being come, the sceptre departed finally from Judah, as it had long before from Israel. (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.)—How far the prophecy may be supposed to have received a primary accomplishment, by the deliverance, within two or three years, of Judah from the two kings which threatened its destruction; and yet afterwards to have had a far more striking and exact completion, when Immanuel was born, and when he was yet an infant, the former being a confirmation and sure pledge of the latter; I shall leave it with the reader to determine: but upon so difficult and so important a subject, I was willing to adduce every hint, which might tend to a fuller elucidation of it. ‘Butter and honey shall he eat, when ‘he shall know to refuse what is evil, and to choose what ‘is good. For before this child shall know, to refuse the ‘evil and to choose the good, the land shall become desc-

‘late, by whose two kings thou art distressed.’ Bp. Lowth. As butter and honey were articles of food, plentiful in Judea during peaceable times, but not to be obtained when the country was the seat of war; the Bishop supposes, that the child referred to was born in a time of war; but that before he arrived at the age of two or three years, he should be enabled to eat butter and honey. (Note, 21—25, v. 23.)

V. 17—19. The Lord would not permit the Syrians and Israelites entirely to prevail against Ahaz; but he would have him, and his family, and idolatrous subjects to know, that such judgments were coming upon them, as had never been experienced, since the days of Rehoboam, when Jeroboam and the ten tribes revolted from the family of David. These would be brought on them especially by the king of Assyria, on whom Ahaz placed an improper dependence; (Notes, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. xvi. 7—18. 1 Chr. v. 25, 26. 2 Chr. xxviii. 16—18;) but the Egyptians would also concur in them. Probably, Egypt abounded with troublesome and noisome swarms of flies; and Assyria might be remarkable for bees, which gave great pain by their stings, and collected honey from every quarter. In allusion to these insects, the Lord intimated his design of giving the signal to those nations, to come in great multitudes, and possess every part of the land. (Marg. Ref. k, l.)—‘The metaphor is taken from the practice of those that keep bees; who draw them together from their hives into the field, and lead them back again, ... by a hiss or ‘whistle.’ Cyril in Bp. Lowth, on v. 26.—Judea lay between the kingdoms of Egypt and Assyria, and was continually harassed by those contending powers. The Assyrians weakened Ahaz, instead of helping him: Sennacherib exceedingly impoverished the land in Hezekiah’s reign. The Assyrian king took Manasseh captive, and made the land tributary: and the kings of Babylon, who destroyed Jerusalem and desolated the land, ruled over many of the same countries. Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, slew good Josiah, and carried Jehoahaz prisoner into Egypt, and thus hastened the ruin of Judah.—The “uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt” may mean those parts of the land which bordered upon the seven mouths of the river Nile; or which lay beyond them.—‘Archbishop Usher ... supposes that the conquest of Egypt (xx.) happened before the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib; and that a great many Egyptians were his auxiliaries in that expedition.’ Lowth.—Sennacherib invaded Judea, and took the fenced cities: but he was not permitted to besiege Jerusalem. (xxxvii. 33—35. Notes, viii. 6—8.)

V. 20. The Lord intended to employ the king of Assyria, (whom Ahaz had hired with the sacred treasures: Note, 2 Kings xvi. 7—9;) as his servant in executing judgment on the land, and to give him the spoil of it for his wages: (Note, Ez. xxix. 17—20;) and he would destroy both princes and rulers, the priests and most eminent persons, and the poor of the land, in such a manner; that the desolation would resemble the razor clearing away the hair from the head, the feet, and the beard, without any discrimination. To be shaved was considered either as a deep disgrace, or a token of mourning and distress. This gives an idea of much more terrible depredation and destruction by the Assyrian invasion, than we are apt to receive from a cursory reading of the history. (Notes, viii. 6—8. x. 28—34. xxxiii. 7—9. 2 Kings xviii. 13. xix. 3.)

V. 21—25. Through the scarcity of inhabitants, and of cattle, after these desolations, the pastures would be so luxuriant, that a young cow and two ewes would plentifully supply a man’s family with milk and butter, which, with honey, would be almost the only remaining productions of the land. (Notes, 15, 16.) Vineyards, which had been let at high rents, (as a thousand vines for a thousand pieces of silver yearly, Note, Cant. viii. 11, 12,) would then be overgrown with briers and thorns; and would become the coverts of wild beasts, or the resort of robbers, which the inhabitants should come with bows and arrows to destroy. Nay, the mattock and plow would be generally disused, of which the thorns and briers are figuratively represented as afraid; or the expression may mean, that those places, which, when the prophet wrote, were so well cultivated, that no one would have feared their being covered by briers and thorns, would then be over-run with them: in short, agriculture would cease, and the whole land would either become a forest, or a pasture for cattle. The promise made to Hezekiah, just before the destruction of Sennacherib's army, may intimate, that the land had, during the preceding desolations, been generally left uncultivated, and would require some time to bring it into the former state of cultivation. (xxxvii. 30. Note, 2 Kings xix. 29.) Yet, probably, subsequent more entire and long-continued desolations of Judah, by the inhabitants of the same regions, are intended. (Notes, 17—19. xxvii. 7—11, v. 10. xxxii. 9—14, v. 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Ungodly men are often punished by others as wicked as themselves.—“In the fear of the LORD is strong confidence:” but those who despise him, not only meet with great afflictions, but are destitute of support and comfort under them: and the most daring rebels against God are frequently most terrified by perils from their fellow creatures; so that their “hearts are moved, as the trees of the wood are shaken by the wind.” But, whatever men devise, “the counsel of the LORD shall stand:” and regard to his own glory, and to his faithful word, frequently induces him to interpose in our favour, when there is nothing else to move him to it.—When ungodly men are in distress or terror, they devise many expedients for safety: but they seldom think of humbling themselves before God, and seeking help from him; nay, if left to the bent of their own evil inclinations, they will venture any extremity of danger and misery, rather than submit to it. Our God will, however, proceed with his own plan; and not leave sinners any excuse, either through want of warning or encouragement, for continuance in sin.—Whilst he has work for the fire-brands of the earth to perform, they continue to consume all before them: but when they have fulfilled their commission, they will be extinguished in smoke and stench: and they are often on the summit of prosperity, and most confidently expecting its continuance and increase, when ruin suddenly overtakes them. (Notes, Nah. i. 9—13. 1 Thes. v. 1—3.) We should then take heed to the word of God, and quietly wait its accomplishment; and committing our cause to him, we need not be faint-hearted because of any enemies. But, whatever unmerited and unexpected deliverances the Lord may vouchsafe; except we believe and obey his word, and trust in his pro-

God, and not to fear man; as the way to safety, when numbers would be ensnared and destroyed, 11—15. The prophet, (as a type of Christ,) with his disciples, are signs to the people, 16—18. He warns them against diviners; directs them to the word of God as the only test and standard of truth; and predicts the blasphemy and despair of the rebellious, 19—22.

tection, we cannot be established, either in outward prosperity, or in serenity of mind.

V. 10—25.

The Lord is ever ready to satisfy the humble enquirer, who desires to know and believe his truth, yet is perplexed with difficulties and objections; but no evidence can convince such as “hate the light,” because they are enemies to God through pride of heart and love of sin: and infidelity is equally provoking, whether it haughtily despise the evidence which the Lord vouchsafes, or whether it presumptuously demand such proof as the case does not require or admit.—But ungodly men always varnish over their crimes with some specious colouring, even when their rebellion is most daring: and many pretend a fear of tempting God, when in fact they are determined not to trust or serve him. It is, though in itself a heinous crime, yet comparatively but a small thing, for men to grieve and weary the faithful and pious servants of God, who honestly seek their good: alas! sinners also weary the Lord himself, and daily urge him to execute vengeance upon them. But he will encourage humble believers, whilst he leaves hardened infidels to their own delusions: and the recollection of those promises, which will surely be fulfilled in their season, tends greatly to invigorate true faith, in the most trying circumstances.—If the prospect of the coming of the divine Saviour was a never-failing support to the hopes of ancient believers: what cause have we to rejoice and be thankful, that “the virgin hath conceived and born a Son, and called his name Immanuel!” that “the Word was made flesh;” and that in our nature he passed through the several stages of childhood, youth, and manhood, to “fulfil all righteousness,” as our Surety, and to set us an example through all, of “refusing the evil and choosing the good;” and then closed his life, by offering himself an all-sufficient sacrifice for our sins! May we learn to trust and love him, as now risen, ascended, and, in our nature and for our benefit, reigning upon the mediatorial throne; and, whilst we come to our reconciled Father through his advocacy, may we copy his example through every scene of life and death. Thus we shall speedily be delivered from all that we dread or abhor, and become “more than conquerors” over every enemy, “through him that loved us.”—But sorrows of every kind are speedily coming on all those, who “neglect so great salvation:” nor can any dignity or sacredness of character, or obscurity and meanness, preserve those from divine judgments, who continue in rebellion against God.—The desolations, which sin has brought on many churches and nations, that once were very prosperous, not only give warning to others, not to copy their example, but teach every individual to moderate his regard to those objects, which may soon be torn from him; and they awfully assure us, that if we remain unfruitful under the means of grace, the Lord will shortly pronounce sentence

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—4. This chapter begins a new prophecy, which some think is concluded at the seventh verse of the ninth chapter; but others suppose to be continued to the end of the twelfth chapter.—The Lord commanded his prophet to take a large roll, sufficient to contain, in legible characters, the words which are mentioned, and perhaps the whole prophecy connected with them; and "to write in it with a man's pen," that is, in the plainest manner.—'Such a pen, and such characters, as are in ordinary use among men. ... Rev. xxi. 17.' Lowth.—Some render the word, translated "a roll," a plate of polished brass, such as were used for mirrors; and by "a man's pen," an engraving tool; that, being written in this manner, it might be publicly exhibited. (Note, Hab. ii. 1—3.)—The words to be written were "concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz," which signifies, "to hasten the spoil, to take quickly the prey." It is probable, that this title was affixed to the prophecy, and it was thus intimated, that the Assyrians would speedily and rapidly execute the predicted vengeance. (Notes, vii. 17—25.)—Accordingly the "prophet took faithful witnesses to record," who might be ready to testify, if required, that he wrote the prophecy at the time mentioned, and prior to the events foretold. And his wife, (called "the prophetess," either on account of her relation to him, or because she too was endued with the spirit of prophecy,) being pregnant at that time, or about that time becoming pregnant, he was ordered to give the same name to the child, when born, as a memorial of the prediction, and a token of its accomplishment. For before this child should know how to cry "My father and my mother," which children soon learn, the king of Assyria would seize and carry away the immense riches of Damascus, and all the spoil of Samaria. 'This prophecy was accordingly fulfilled within three years; when Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, went up against Damascus and took it, and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Retzin; and also took the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the 'half tribe of Manasseh, and carried them captive to Assyria.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, vii. 15, 16. 2 Kings xv. 29. xvi. 7—16. 1 Chr. v. 25, 26.)—Some expositors think, that "the witnesses" and "the record" imply, that Isaiah on this occasion married another wife; though it is not said that the mother of Shear-jashub was dead: (Note, vii. 3:) but others suppose that these witnesses (who were persons of rank, though Uriah was a man of very bad character, Marg. Ref. e.) were called on to attend the circumcision of the prophet's son, and to attest the name by which he was called, as well as the prophecy confirmed or illustrated by that name.—'And I took unto me faithful witnesses, both of this act that I did, in fastening this roll upon the doors of the temple, and the name given to my said son, in his circumcision: for ... my wife, the prophetess, had conceived and born a son, and the Lord had appointed me to call him by this name.' Bp. Hall.—It has been thought, that these scenes were only acted in vision: but this way of interpreting what is related as fact, without evident necessity, seems a dangerous liberty in explaining Scripture. (Note, Hos. i. 2, 3.)

V. 6—8. Perhaps, there was a strong party in Judah disaffected to the family of David, which secretly favoured the confederates; and this part of the prophecy might be addressed to them, as well as to the people of Israel who had revolted from that family.—Shiloah was a rivulet near Jerusalem, from which the pool of Siloam, probably, was supplied, and of which the very name had a typical meaning. (John ix. 7.)—The gentleness of this small current represented the mildness and equity of the government of David and his posterity, compared with that of other neighbouring princes. (Preface to 1 Kings.—Notes, 1 Kings xii. 4. 16.) The Israelites, and many Jews also, ungratefully forgot their obligations to the house of David, and, through unbelief, despised the still greater Blessing which was to descend from it: so that contemning its enfeebled condition, they were ready to concur with Rezin and Pekah, in their attempts to destroy it.—As a gentle brook is an apt emblem of a mild government; so a large, impetuous, overflowing river aptly represents a mighty conqueror and a powerful tyrant: and God was about to bring the waters of such an overwhelming torrent, to punish the people for rejecting David's family, and for their multiplied sins. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lix. 16—19. Rev. xii. 13—17.) Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, at the head of numerous, victorious, and veteran troops, glorying in his conquests, and grasping after new acquisitions, was like a mighty river overflowing all his banks, and rolling his impetuous streams through the adjacent lands. (Note, Dan. ix. 25—27.) The kingdom of Judah was represented as a human body. The inundation reached even to the neck; but the head, the capital city, Jerusalem, still remained above water. (Note, vii. 17—19.)—The success of the Assyrian was also described by the similitude of a monstrous bird of prey, which stretched forth its wings over the whole land. (Notes, Ez. xvii. 3, 4. 7, 8.) Yet the prophet, in predicting these dreadful scenes, addressed himself to Immanuel in person, as the Proprietor of this land: the promised Messiah, "in the form of God," was then Lord of that land especially: there, in the fulness of time, he would surely assume human nature, and appear "in the form of "a servant:" and Immanuel would therefore certainly deliver his land, from Sennacherib's invasion, for his own sake, and for the sake of his promise to David his servant. (Notes, vii. 14. 2 Kings xix. 30, 31. Matt. xxii. 41—46.)—"The prophet never calls Immanuel his son: and here 'he speaks of him as a distinct person, from both the 'children above mentioned; and in such a style, as befits 'none but him, that was to be in an eminent manner, the 'Son of David and King of Israel.' Lowth.

 V. 9, 10. These verses are a bold challenge to all the enemies of God's people. (xxxvii. 35.) Let as many of them, as were inclined to do it, combine together; let them strengthen themselves, and prepare for the attempt by every means which they could devise; let them concert their operations with the most profound policy, and promise themselves and each other success, with the utmost confidence; and let them give their orders with the greatest decision: their efforts would be frustrated, and themselves broken to pieces. This the prophet repeated [†]three times, to shew his confidence that it would certainly be so, "for," says he, "God is with us." The word is "IMMANUEL," referring to the virgin's Son before promised: (Note, vii. 14:) as this blessing was ensured to them, no counsel or confederacy which interfered with it could prosper.—This prediction has been fulfilled in the ruin of Syria and Israel; in the destruction of Sennacherib's powerful armies from various countries; and in that of Babylon and its dependences: and it is equally applicable to every combination against the church of Christ, and will be fulfilling till the last enemy shall be put under his feet. (Notes, vii. 1, 2. liv 15—17. Ps. xlvii. 1—7. Joel iii. 9—17. Mic. iv. 11—13. Zech. xiv. 1—3. Rev. xvi. 12—16. xvii. 9—14. xix. 11—21.)

 V. 11—15. The prophet next declared the instruction, which the Lord had powerfully impressed upon his mind, by no means to walk in the way of that people. 'The prophet felt an extraordinary impulse to deliver this message 'as from God, containing a doctrine of importance (13): 'who likewise inspired him with courage and presence of 'mind to discharge his duty in this particular.' Lowth.—He commanded and encouraged him also to address the people saying, "Say ye not, A confederacy, &c." This was a caution to them, not to give credit to every report of combinations formed against the nation, and not to yield to desponding fears. (Note, vii. 2.) The word rendered "confederacy" is commonly used in a bad sense, for an unlawful conspiracy; and the combination of Rezin and Pekah was an impious attempt to defeat the promises of God to the house of David. (Note, vii. 5, 6.) It was also the effect of unbelief in the Jews, to be so alarmed at a confederacy which was sure to be defeated; and their propensity to form alliances with heathen princes arose from distrust of God, and disregard to his commandments. 'Many of the Jews were secret friends to Rezin and Pekah, 'and this circumstance much increased the fears of that 'invasion; because it was given out that they had a strong 'party among the people of Judea.' Lowth. This was therefore a conspiracy in the most criminal sense of the word. Instead of this sinful fear of man, the people were called on to "sanctify the LORD of hosts himself, and let "him be their fear, and their dread." (Notes, Matt. x. 27, 28. Rev. xv. 1—4, v. 4.) That is, they were required to honour his glorious majesty, to dread his wrath, to reverence his authority, to cleave to his worship and service, and to trust in his mercy, truth, and power. For "he would be a “Sanctuary,” a holy Refuge to such as thus sanctified him: (Notes, xxvi. 20, 21. Ez. xi. 14—16:) but, at the same time, he would be “for a Stone of stumbling, and “a Rock of offence” or an occasion of falling, “to both “the houses of Israel;” that is to that large majority of both nations, which did not trust in him and serve him: “and for a Gin and a Snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem” especially.—In the time of Sennacherib’s invasion, and afterwards during the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the consequent captivity, and at many other times; whilst true believers found “the LORD a “Sanctuary” to them; multitudes of unbelieving Jews were emboldened in presumptuous confidence, by their external relation to God, and by their privileges: and this unwarranted dependence, whilst they continued impenitent and rebellious, proved a snare to them, and accelerated their ruin. But the references made to this and similar passages, in the New Testament, point out its grand accomplishment, and shew whom the apostles understood to be “the LORD of hosts himself.” (Notes, xxviii. 16. Matt. xxi. 40—44. Luke ii. 33—35. Rom. ix. 30—33. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8.) For while Christ and his cross were a Sanctuary to the remnant of believers, they proved a stumbling block to the Jewish nation in general: and their erroneous explication of their own scriptures, and false confidence that God would protect them, ensnared them to their ruin, which was attended with unheard of circumstances of horror.—‘This text is directly spoken of God by the prophet, but applied to Christ in the above-mentioned places. ...A plain proof that Christ is God, and is described as ‘such by the prophets.’ Lowth.

V. 16. The prophet delivered the testimony and command of God to the people: (Notes, 20. Ps. xix. 7—11. 1 John v. 9—12:) but they, being generally blinded by their prejudices and sins, did not understand his words; so that they were “bound up and sealed among his disciples,” or those who cordially attended on his instructions. (Notes, xxviii. 14, 15. xxix. 9—12. 17—19.) Nay, they were in a great measure closed, and “sealed up” from believers, as they related to future events; yet the prophet was ordered to preserve his predictions, as a sacred deposit for future ages. (Note, Dan. xii. 4.)—Thus the doctrines, promises, predictions, and commandments of Christ, were “sealed among his disciples;” others disregarded them, and the Jews in particular have the veil upon their hearts to this day: (Notes, Matt. xiii. 10—15. 2 Cor. iii. 12—16:) nay, where the word of Christ relates to future and remote events, it is, in great measure, sealed up even from his disciples, until its accomplishment. ‘Although at present ‘they were as a book sealed up: yet when the event answered the prediction, they would be a justification of ‘God’s truth, and of those who depended on his word.’ Lowth.

V. 17. The prophet foresaw, that the Lord would “hide his face,” and withdraw the tokens of his special favour, from the house of Jacob; but he would “wait on” him, and look for his return in favour to them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxx. 18, 19. liv. 6—10. Mic. vii. 5—7. Hab. ii. 1—3. iii. 17—19.) This might refer to preceding calamities, and to the Babylonish captivity, and the restoration of the Jews to their own land: but it seems also to mark out their present rejected and dispersed state, and to imply a promise of their future admission into the church, and restoration to their former prosperity.

V. 18. The prophet had called the two children, “which “God had given him,” by very significant names; (Notes, 1—4. vii. 3;) and every time they were mentioned, they would bring his predictions of judgment and of mercy to remembrance. Some of the people would be astonished, that the prophet should give his sons such remarkable names; and others would deride both him and them with the most entire scorn and contempt: so that “he and his “children were for signs and wonders in Israel, from the “LORD,” who had ordered him thus to call them. (Notes, Ps. lxxi. 7. Zech. iii. 8.) For though they were not miraculous signs, confirming to the senses the certainty of the predictions; yet they were memorials from God concerning them, suited to excite attention and expectation.—St. Paul has quoted this passage in an argumentative discourse, and applied it in such a manner, as proves, that Immanuel himself, and his people, whom he condescends to own both as brethren and children, were especially intended. (Notes, liii. 9, 10. Ps. xxii. 30, 31. Heb. ii. 10—13.) He was “a sign, that should be spoken against;” (Note, Luke ii. 33—35;) and they have ever been beheld with wonder and derision, or detestation, because of their conformity to him, and their zealous attachment to his cause, doctrines, and precepts.—This is, among many, a clear instance, by the apostle’s testimony, of a twofold fulfilment of prophecies: one more immediate, but less important or adequate; the other more remote, but more fully answering to the emphatical language of the inspired writer.

V. 19. The unbelieving Jews were prone to seek information, counsel, and help, from diviners and wizards of different descriptions; which was expressly forbidden in the law, and was in fact worshipping the devil: and they even counselled and encouraged each other to do it, in their difficulties, and when “the LORD hid his face from” them. (Notes, xlvii. 12—15. Ex. xxi. 18. Lev. xx. 6.

These persons, it seems, used strange fantastick gestures in their incantations; such as peeping out of the corners of their eyes, and muttering as if they spake out of their belly; with other ceremonies suited to their abominable practices. (Marg. Ref.) But when the Jews were persuaded to seek unto such persons, the prophet instructed them to enquire, whether a people should not seek to their God: and whether it were right or reasonable to leave the living to consult the dead; the living God, to consult dead idols, or the spirits of dead men, whom these witches and wizards pretended to bring up to them! (Notes, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6—19.) A strong expression of indignant abhorrence.

V. 20. The law of God is the standard of duty; his “sure testimony,” the standard of truth; his promise, the firm ground of hope.—When, therefore, the people wanted instruction, counsel, or encouragement, let them go to the law, truths, and promises of God. If they would not receive the prophet’s message, or doubted its authenticity, let them recur to the law of Moses, and other preceding parts of revelation. Let them prove all their principles, practices, and characters, by this standard: and try the doctrines and counsels of the instructors and advisers by the same touchstone. But if any were so perverse, as to reject and contradict this simple rule of judgment, it was plain they were devoid of spiritual understanding; for no hope or comfort could be found in any other way.—‘They have no knowledge, but are blind leaders of the blind.’ (Notes, xxx. 8—11. Ps. cxix. 130. Jer. viii. 8, 9. Mic. iii. 5—7. Matt. vi. 22, 23. xv. 12—14.)—Philosophical illuminators, and enthusiastical pretenders to new revelations, not to be judged of by “the law and the testimony,” are alike concerned in this decision.—This interpretation, however scriptural, apposite, and important, is objected to, on account of a critical difficulty; as if our translation could not convey the true meaning, because the root of the word rendered “light,” signifies ‘to make dark.’ But the same noun is used for the morning or day-break, (when a little light diminishes the darkness,) in the following passages, among many more: (Gen. xxxii. 25. 27. Josh. vi. 15. 1 Sam. ix. 26. Job xxxviii. 12. Ps. cxxxix. 9:) so that the last clause, I apprehend, with deference to the authority of Bp. Lowth, may be fairly translated: “if they speak not according to this word, it is because no morning” (not the least dawn of light) “is in him;” i. e. in any one of them. (Notes, Prov. iv. 18, 19. Hos. vi. 1—3. 2 Pet. i. 19—21.) “Unto the command, and unto the testimony, let them seek: If they will not speak according to this word, in “which there is no obscurity.” Bp. Lowth.—In this translation, the verse contains an appeal, in support of the prophet’s words; in which there was no obscurity, to the law and to the testimony; to the preceding parts of the sacred oracles. But our translation, which seems genuine, contains a more solemn, decisive, and scriptural appeal, applicable in all ages and cases.

V. 21, 22. Inevitable and intolerable evils were coming on each of those, who rejected “the law and testimony” of God, to trust in diviners, idols, or carnal confidences. None of them would by any means escape the approaching calamities, and all would pass through them in the utmost distress and penury. And when ready to perish with hunger, they would increase their own anguish by extreme impatience: they would curse their king, or rulers, for their ruinous measures: and even blaspheme God, while in vain they looked upward for help. (Notes, 2 Kings vi. 28—31. Rev. xvi. 10, 11.) Nor could any assistance or relief be obtained: but on which side soever they looked, they would behold troubles, dismay, and increasing anguish; till hardened in impious and impenitent rage and blasphemy, they would be driven into final despair and misery. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. x. 21—23. Prov. xiv. 32. Luke xxi. 25—28. 2 Pet. ii. 17. Jude 11—13.)—This may refer to the miseries of many individuals in Sennacherib’s invasion; or rather predict the dreadful calamities during the siege and sack of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans: but it most exactly corresponds to the account given by Josephus of the siege of that city by the Romans, and the miseries connected with that awful event.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

We have continual reason to bless God, for causing his revealed will to be written for our instruction, “with a “man’s pen,” in language level to our feeble capacities; and for giving us, in his providence, a faithful translation of the scriptures into our own tongue.—Those who treat on divine matters ought to study plainness, that men in general may understand them: even though it should interfere with the display of their eloquence and erudition, and with their reputation among the learned and judicious few.—The accomplishment of the prophecies forms a conclusive evidence of the divine original of the scriptures: too much care cannot be taken to ascertain, that they were written on the occasions mentioned in them; and the testimony of the Jews, who have ever been “faithful witnesses to record,” that the books of the Old Testament have been handed down, through succeeding ages, from the persons whose names they bear, is very valuable and useful, as a cogent argument in our controversy with the enemies of our holy faith.—We should endeavour, that every surrounding object may remind us of the words of God, whether of judgment or of mercy; and that those

CHAP. IX.

Predictions of deliverance and joy to the people of God, through the incarnation, salvation, and kingdom, treasures which men idolize or abuse, will speedily be torn from them.—Those, who reject the salvation and authority of Christ, and refuse his peace and consolation, that they may rejoice in worldly confidences and pleasures; will soon find their licentious liberty to be the basest slavery, their joys to terminate in anguish, and their security in desperation. But happy are the subjects of Immanuel, who live in his land; for he will take care of his church in the most urgent circumstances. The enemies of his cause may often come in, like an inundation from some mighty river, overflowing all its banks; they may sweep to destruction numbers of professed Christians, and occasion many troubles to believers: but the church will hold her head above water, in the worst of times, and may bid defiance to all the hosts of her enemies. (Notes, Matt. vii. 24—27. xvi. 18.) Let persecuting kings and nobles conspire against her, with combined power; let wealth and nobility unite with learning, genius, and philosophy, to run down the despised doctrine of the cross; let men of every nation associate, and gird themselves; let them take counsel, give laws, menace, boast, speak, write, triumph: yet, as Jesus is “Immanuel, God with us,” we may boldly say, “the LORD of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is “our Refuge.” (Notes, Ps. xlv. 1—7.) Their counsel shall come to nought, their word shall not stand; and the present and future enemies of the church shall share the fate of those, who formerly have been broken to pieces; and have been constrained to say, ‘Thou hast overcome, O Nazarene!’

V. 11—22.

It requires the powerful influences of divine grace to preserve even pious men from conforming, in some respects, to the way of nominal Christians, and formal professors of the gospel; and from either desponding, or employing carnal weapons, in perilous times. When those who are weak or wavering in the faith see persecuting powers, or boasting scholars, combining against the people or truths of Christ, they are ready to give up all for lost. But let us not be thus dismayed: the cause of God is in no danger; but the ruin will fall either upon open opposers, or hypocritical friends. They who “sanctify the “LORD of hosts himself,” and fear and trust in him, as dwelling in human nature; who value nothing in comparison with his grace, and fear nothing so much as coming short of it, or dishonouring his name, shall find him “a “Sanctuary,” and be kept by his power through faith unto salvation.—But the crucified Immanuel, who was, and is, “a stumbling-stone and a rock of offence” to unbelieving Jews; is no less so to thousands, who are called Christians. The preaching of the cross is foolishness in their estimation: his doctrines and precepts, and the reproach of his cause offend them: and yet they rely on a name, a form, or a notion; and are buoyed up in vain confidence, till they are snared and taken captive by Satan at his will.—Even to this day, the truths and commands of Christ are sealed from the generality of his nominal disciples; so of Christ, 1—7: of dreadful vengeance on Israel, for their pride, hypocrisy, and impenitent wickedness, and through the success of their enemies, and their own furious contentions, 8—21.

that they do not perceive the nature or glory of them. “It “is given” to believers only, “to know the mysteries of the “kingdom of God:” but “to them that are without” all is enveloped in parables. (Notes, vi. 9, 10. Matt. xiii. 10—15.) “The secret of the LORD is with them that fear “him;” (Note, Ps. xxv. 14;) and they are “all taught of “God:” yet their knowledge will not be complete, till “the mystery of God be finished,” and till they see him face to face. In the mean time they wait on him, and look for him, even when he hides his face from them, and is pleased to leave his church in trouble: and they shall not wait or look in vain. He will come at death to receive their souls; he will come ere long to render his truth universally victorious, and he will come at length to raise the dead, and to judge the world.—As the Divine Redeemer was contradicted, and blasphemed, and treated with the utmost scorn and enmity, even by Israel; and as “he is “not ashamed to call us brethren” and “children:” surely we should not be averse to be treated by the world, and even by professed Christians, as he was, and as prophets and apostles were in their days. But let us aim to be a memorial, and an example to them: and let parents so educate their children, and ministers so watch over their people, as may give them a good hope of being able to say, in the great day of account, “Behold, I, and the children whom the LORD hath given me;” and then will their salvation be completed “from the LORD of hosts, “which dwelleth in Zion.”—Let us then keep close to his word and ordinances, and not listen to deceivers of whatever name, who would excite our attention by unscriptural and unauthenticated pretensions to intercourse with the world of spirits; or who use vain and unaccountable observances, by way of charms or incantations, in order to obtain supernatural help and information. Should not the worshippers of God trust in him, and seek assistance from him alone? and should they use any suspicious or unwarranted means of obtaining relief? And would not this be, to go from the living God, to seek help from the dying, or the dead? Let us then attend to the law of God, where all such practices are condemned; and to his “testimony,” where all needful or desirable help is promised, in the use of appointed or allowed means. Let us try all doctrines and practices by that unerring rule and warranted standard: and so trust his promises, as to obey his precepts. In all this, neither obscurity, nor any thing dubious, can be found: but those who speak contrary to this word, and attempt to establish ought in opposition to it, are evidently infatuated and “blinded by the god of this world:” and all the miseries, which ever were felt or witnessed on earth, are as nothing, compared with that anguish, despair, and blasphemy which will shortly overwhelm them. Then will they fret themselves, and curse those who have led them into their delusions; and, looking round on every side for help, but in vain, they shall be driven into “the blackness of darkness for ever.” May the Lord preserve us from this condemnation!

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. The connexion of this verse, with those which precede and follow it, is attended with great difficulty; and its meaning, as it stands in our translation, very perplexed. It probably should be rendered, "But there shall not hereafter be darkness in the land which was distressed: in the former time he debased the land of Zebulun, and the land of Naphtali: but in the latter time he hath made it glorious; even the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the nations." Bp. Lowth. The kings of Assyria first ravaged those countries, which lay on the coasts of the sea of Tiberias, and on the northern part of Jordan, called "Galilee of the Gentiles," as bordering on the Gentiles, or long occupied by them: (1 Kings ix. 11. Note, 2 Kings xv. 29 :) and that region was first favoured and honoured with the preaching of the gospel by Christ and his apostles. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, John i. 43—46. ii. 1—11.) The word (הקבץ) rendered "more grievously afflict," may mean, and indeed more properly signifies, made glorious: and this gives a clear sense to the passage. Whatever judgments came upon unbelievers, or the nation in general, mercy was reserved for Israel, which would be first communicated to those parts of the land, which had been first ruined. And this event seems to have been exclusively predicted, according to St. Matthew's interpretation of it. (Note, Matt. iv. 12—17.) 'To make the Hebrew text correspond with the sense of it given by the Evangelist, we must understand it as a comfortable promise to those parts: ... whereas the contrary is rather suggested in the usual translation of the words.' Lowth.

V. 2. When Israel forsook "the law and the testimony" of God, the nation was left in darkness and ignorance, wickedness and misery; as "in the land of the shadow of death," a shadow of the state of the wicked in another world. But when Christ came, "a great light shined upon them," to shew them the path of truth, comfort, and holiness. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lx. 1—3. Matt. iv. 12—17, v. 16. Luke i. 76—79. John xii. 34—36. Acts xxvi. 18—20.)

V. 3. The nation of Israel had been immensely multiplied, notwithstanding all calamities: yet in general their joy was not increased, because of their sins. But when this light arose, believers rejoiced before God with holy joy; as men rejoice when they reap the harvest, after the toil of cultivation and the patience of waiting for it; or when they divide the spoil, after the perils of the battle. (Marg. Ref.—Note, liii. 9—12.) 'When thou shalt thus graciously visit thy people, howsoever the nation shall not be greater than it now is, yet the joy of it shall be more: as now contrarily, the people are more, but the joy is not more.' Bp. Hall. 'The prophet notes it to be a religious joy; because it is said to be before God, that is in his presence, and with a grateful acknowledgement of his benefits. (Deut. xii. 12.)' Lowth.—Several manuscripts read, (as the margin also does,) "Thou hast to him," (or to the nation, to Israel,) "increased the joy:" which seems to denote, that the events predicted would be the source of greater joy to all true Israelites, the substance of the nation, (Note, vi. 13,) than any of their former deliverances; though at the same time, the unbelieving Jews, who constituted the bulk of the nation, would be driven into darkness: as they accordingly were, both as to their outward miseries, and their dark and blinded state in respect of spiritual concerns.

V. 4, 5. The Jews were successively delivered from the burdensome and galling yoke of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians: but these deliverances were only a shadow of redemption from the yoke of Satan; and that redemption seems here especially predicted, as if already accomplished. By the gospel of Christ and the pouring out of his Spirit, the Lord brake the yoke from off his people, and delivered them from the heavy burden, hard drudgery, and cruel treatment, of that insolent oppressor; as in the day when he delivered Israel from the Midianites by Gideon. (Notes, x. 24—27. xiv. 24—27. lxi. 1—3. Judg. vii. 16—25.) Those battles, by which successful warriors rescued nations from oppression, were attended "with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood;" but the redemption, here predicted, would be "with burning, and fuel of fire:" the influences of the Spirit are like purifying fire; sharp afflictions, as a fiery trial, refine believers as gold in the furnace: and the predicted events were attended with most tremendous vengeance upon the unbelieving Jewish nation; as they will be finally on all unbelievers. (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 5—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.)—Some explain the fifth verse of the burning of the weapons of war, the accoutrements of warriors, and the garments rolled in blood, under the reign of the Prince of peace. (Notes, Ps. xlv. 8, 9. Ez. xxxix. 8—10.)

V. 6, 7. The connexion of this illustrious prophecy with the preceding verse assures us, that it was the immediate scope of the Holy Spirit in the whole passage, to point out the coming and kingdom of Christ.—The prophet spake of the predicted blessings, as if already communicated. “Unto us,” says he, “a Child is born.” Angels say, “Unto you;” (Note, Luke ii. 8—14, v. 11;) but this Child was born for the benefit of us men, of us sinners, of us believers, of all believers from the beginning to the end of the world.—“Unto us a Son is given.” The only begotten Son of God is given to us, and for us, to become the Son of man; that he might be our Surety, Sacrifice, Advocate, and Salvation: he was given by the Father, and he gave himself.—“And the government shall be on his ‘shoulder.’” (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, xxii. 20—25. Rev. iii. 7.) The Redeemer rules, not only over his people, but over all worlds as Mediator, for their benefit; and he is able to support the weight of this universal and absolute authority. (Notes, Matt. xxviii. 18. Eph. i. 15—23, v. 22. Phil. ii. 9—11.) “His name shall be called WONDERFUL:” he is wonderful in his person, as IMMANUEL, God and man, “God manifest in the flesh;” in his love and mercy; in his hatred of sin, and righteous regard to the holy law; in his compassion to the vilest and worst of sinners; in his majesty and humiliation; in his perfect righteousness, and willing sufferings; and in the method which he took to baffle Satan, overcome death, reconcile divine justice and mercy, and establish his kingdom by dying on the cross. In every part of his character and work, he may justly “be called Wonderful;” and also, in that his glory is incomprehensible, “for no man knoweth the Son but the ‘Father.’” (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 29, 30. Judg. xiii. 18—22. Matt. xi. 27.)—He should also be called “Counsellor:” the Word and Wisdom of God came forth from him, to make known his perfections, truths, and will; to be made wisdom to us; and to be our infallible Counsellor in all difficulties and perplexities; so that they, who depend on his guidance, and pray for his Spirit, are led “in the midst ‘of the paths of judgment.’” (Notes, Zech. vi. 12, 13. John i. 18. Eph. iii. 9—12. Col. ii. 1—4. 8—10.) For “this ‘Child born’ is indeed ‘the mighty God,’ one with and equal to the Father, according to the sacred mystery of the Trinity in Unity: he possesses all divine attributes, and exercises them through his human nature: and thus is he ‘mighty’ to save his people, and to vanquish and destroy all enemies. (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, 1 Tim. iii. 16.)—He is also ‘the everlasting Father:’ ‘the second Adam, the ‘Lord from heaven,’ ‘the everlasting Father’ of the whole church, which derives its spiritual being and life from him, as the whole race of men derive their existence from the first Adam. He is “become to all them that obey ‘him, the Author of eternal salvation:’” (Heb. v. 9:) ‘the Author of eternity, by whom the church and every ‘member of it, shall ... have immortal life.’ (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 45—49.) ‘The Septuagint render the words Πατήρ μελλοντος αιωνος, “The Father of the world to come;” and the Vulgar Latin follow this translation; which since ‘the Hebrew words admit of it, I can’t but have a particular regard for: ... because I am persuaded it is from ‘the authority of this text, that the kingdom of the Messias is called in the New Testament, by the title of μελλων αιων, “The age, or world to come.” (Matt. xii. 32. Heb. ii. 5. vi. 5.)’ Lowth. And as he has loved his church “with an everlasting love;” so he will for ever live to bless it, being “the Prince of peace:” the great Author of reconciliation to God; the Giver of peace in the heart and conscience; the Prince, who commands all his subjects to live at peace with each other, and inclines them to follow peace with all men. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Heb. vii. 1—3.)—“Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end.” When his kingdom is truly set up in the heart, the efficacy of it shall endure and increase for ever: as it is set up on earth, it shall continue to diffuse its influence, till his authority be universally submitted to, and produce universal harmony; so that men shall “beat their swords into plow-shares, and “their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up “sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any “more;” (Notes, ii. 2—5. Rev. xx. 1—6;) yet even this shall be increased, and perfect in heaven for ever.—He shall reign “upon the throne of David, to order it and “establish it...from henceforth even for ever.” (Note, Luke i. 26—33.) He rules in perfect wisdom and equity; he requires righteousness of his subjects, and teaches them to do judgment: he justifies and sanctifies them, and at length will present them faultless before his Father’s throne. And, though his mediatorial kingdom, as he reigns in human nature over all worlds, to fulfil his gracious undertakings, will then terminate, “that God may be all in “all;” yet his special relation to his people, as their Lord and King, will endure for ever. (Notes, Dan. ii. 44, 45. vii. 13, 14. 1 Cor. xv. 20—28.)—These predictions implied most stupendous interpositions of the Lord, in the behalf of his people; and the complete performance of them would be attended with immense difficulties: yet the “zeal “of the LORD,” for the glory of his own justice, truth, and love, and of his holy law and service, would ensure the event; and his power, as the LORD of hosts, would render the whole perfectly easy. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 30, 31.)—The exact coincidence of this prophecy with the doctrine of the New Testament, in the literal interpretation of each, shews evidently, that Jewish prophets and Christian teachers had precisely the same view of the person and salvation of the Messiah: and not only tends to demonstrate the divine authority of the scriptures, in opposition to avowed infidels of every name; but to assure us of the doctrines intended to be taught by them, that we may be fortified against the subtle attempts of more covert enemies to explain them away.

V. 8—12. ‘This whole passage,’ (to the fourth verse of the next chapter,) ‘reduced to its proper and entire form, and healed of the dislocation, which it suffers, by the absurd division of the chapters, makes a distinct prophecy and a just poem, remarkable for the regularity of its disposition, and the elegance of its plan. It has no relation to the preceding or the following prophecy; though the parts, violently torn asunder, have been, on the one side, or the other, patched on to them. Those relate principally to the kingdom of Judah; this is addressed exclusively to the kingdom of Israel.’ Bp. Lowth.—The Lord had, in the law of Moses, and by the ministry of the prophets, denounced dreadful threatenings on those of the posterity of Jacob, who should renounce his worship; and this word “lighted,” or was about to have its full effect, on the people of Israel. Then the Ephraimites, (the kingdom of the ten tribes,) and the citizens of Samaria, would know the truth of JEHOVAH’s word, and the power of his wrath. For under the more gentle rebukes, by the first inroads of the Assyrian kings, they continued proud and stout-hearted, and despised the judgments of God; boasting that they would rebuild their ruined cities and palaces, in a far more magnificent manner, and with more durable materials. But indeed he was about to visit them with more dreadful vengeance: for the king of Assyria, the adversary of Rezin, would shortly subjugate Syria; and then, under the command of the conqueror, the Syrians would appear as enemies to Israel: and whilst these combined forces met them from the east, the Philistines would also attack them from the west, and cut off those who attempted to flee. Thus they would devour Israel with open mouth, as the wolf does the helpless lamb; or, in every corner, as the clause may be rendered: yet even this would not appease the Lord’s anger, or prevent his continuing to execute vengeance upon them. (Note, v 24, 25.)—Some expositors, by a change in the text, on the authority of certain manuscripts, suppose that the princes, not the enemies, of Rezin are meant: but in fact the desolations of Israel were principally made by the Assyrians, after they had subverted the kingdom of Syria, and we do not any where read, that either Rezin, or his princes, invaded the kingdom of Israel. (Notes, vii. 5—9. viii. 6—8. 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. 29. xvii. 1—6. xviii. 9—12.)

V. 13—17. The Israelites did not at all repent of their sins, or return to the worship of the Lord, when he punished them; nor did they seek help and protection from his power. He was therefore determined to cut off every order and description of men from the land; even “the head and the tail,” as from the body of an animal; even the stoutest branch from a tree, and the rush which grows in poor or marshy lands. By “the head,” the elders and nobles of the land were intended; and their false prophets were “the tail,” the most worthless and contemptible part of the body politick. (Notes, xxix. 9—12. lvi. 9—12. Jer. xxiii. 16—30. Ez. xiii. 1—16. Mal. ii. 4—9. Rev. xix. 17—21.) come so wretchedly corrupt, that every one was either profane, or a hypocrite in his religion, and an evil-doer in his dealings, and deceitful in his conversation: so that God could no longer take pleasure in any of them, neither would he have mercy even on orphans and widows, seeing even they were involved in the general guilt and condemnation; nor would any judgments short of utter ruin appease his wrath, or terminate the execution of his vengeance.—The leaders, &c. (16) ‘When the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch. The margin reads, They that call this people ‘blessed.’ Lowth. (iii. 12.)

V. 18—21. The wickedness of the nation, like a fire for a time smothered up, would at length burst forth into a universal conflagration, causing all their glory to vanish, as the columns of smoke ascend and are dissipated. For their sins rendered them fuel for the wrath of God, and this would darken all their hopes and prosperity: and, whilst his judgments, and their enemies, straitened them on every side, they would be so infatuated as to destroy each other without mercy. In their extreme necessity they would plunder and devour one another; snatching on every side for sustenance, yet consumed by unsatisfied hunger, till they were ready to tear their own flesh, or to destroy their nearest relations, as both Manasseh and Ephraim were descended from Joseph. (Note, xlix. 22—26.)—When they thus preyed on their nearest relations, from whom help might have been expected; they, figuratively, “ate every man the flesh of his own arm.” (Jer. xix. 9.)—But the more they were wasted, the more furious would their contentions be; and yet, when occasion offered, the most enraged parties would unite to harass the kingdom of Judah. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Gal. v. 13—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The Lord sometimes visits with his choicest mercies those places which have experienced his severest vengeance: and the gospel, faithfully preached, is an abundant counterbalance for all the temporal vexations, to which any nation can be exposed. Wretched is the state of fallen man without this blessed word of salvation. Men “walk on still in darkness,” yea, in the way to final darkness and hopeless misery. Such must have been the dreary condition of the whole human race, ever since the entrance of sin, had it not been for the promised Saviour, who, “in the fulness of time,” “came a Light into the world,” “to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of his “people.” Blessed be God, this “Sun of Righteousness” has risen on our land, and still shines around us with glorious splendour: yet numbers prefer darkness, and choose to continue “in the land of the shadow of death,” that they may have no disturbance in their sinful pursuits. (Notes, Job xxiv. 13—17. John i. 4, 5. iii. 19—21.) Yea, many who glory of living in this enlightened age, and even of being its luminaries, hate this heavenly light, and prefer to it their own proud imaginations and vague conjectures! But let us remember that this light is intended “to guide our feet into the ways of peace:” and let us earnestly pray that it may shine into our hearts, and make us wise unto salvation. Then indeed the multiplying of believers will “increase our joy” in the Lord. This will far exceed “the joy of harvest,” or of “those who divide the spoil;” (Note, Ps. iv. 6—8;) and abundantly recompense us for all our godly sorrow, self-denial, diligence, losses, and persecutions for the Lord’s sake: for if he has delivered us from the slavery of sin and Satan, he will at length rescue us from the yoke and scourge of every oppressor.—Our chief conflict must be with our own sins; and in this warfare we may hope to obtain more splendid victories, than any conqueror ever did in his bloody contests: for the influences of divine grace will daily weaken our lusts; even fiery trials and afflictions shall concur in securing our victory; and every advantage over the enemy will be an earnest of our eternal triumphs, when made “more than conquerors through him who loved us.”—But all our hopes and joys originate from the incarnate Redeemer: ‘for us men and for our salvation’ he became “a Child born, a Son given,” that he might be “the propitiation for our sins:” for us he obeyed, suffered, and died; for us he arose, ascended, reigns, and intercedes; in our behalf, “all power is given to him in heaven and earth.” Let us adore the wonders of his person, character, and love; and learn in every thing to seek and follow his “counsel,” as well as to obey his command. (Notes, Prov. i. 19—31. Rev. iii. 17—19.) We may indeed safely intrust our souls in his hand, for he is “the mighty God,” and if, from him as “the everlasting Father,” we receive spiritual life, and bear his image, and are “counted to him for a generation;” we shall certainly enjoy that peace which he made and bestows; and shall learn, as the subjects of “the Prince of Peace,” to be peaceable and peace-makers, and to seek the peace of the church and of the world. Let us then pray without ceasing, that his government and peace may increase in our hearts; and rapidly diffuse their benign influence in the world, until they prevail against all opposition, and make all things subject unto them. No doubt, this will ere long be the case: for “the zeal of the “LORD of hosts will surely perform” whatever relates to the execution of his purposes, the ruin of his enemies, the prevalence of his cause, and the salvation of his people.

V. 8—21.

The words of terror which God has spoken will as surely be accomplished, as those of his love; and they often “light” with dreadful efficacy upon his professing people: for they, who will not trust and serve him as a God of mercy, must know him as a “God to whom vengeance ‘belongeth.’” That pride and stoutness of heart, which render numbers fearless of consequences, and induce them to despise rebukes and warnings, and to flatter themselves, and each other, with the hopes of impunity and prosperity in sin, will hasten and aggravate their destruction: and unless the afflicted “turn to him that smiteth them,” and humbly seek his mercy, “his anger will not be turned away, but his hand will be stretched out still;” and temporal calamities will only prove an earnest of eternal misery. Even “the ancient and honourable” will thus perish, if they continue in sin: but the false teachers, who for filthy lucre’s sake promise them peace, will be marked with peculiar contempt and detestation. Yet how common is it for “the leaders of the people to cause them to ‘err,’” and for “the blind to lead the blind,” and to speak peace and blessedness to themselves, and to each other; till they fall together into the pit of destruction! (Notes, Deut. xxix. 19, 20. Jer. vi. 13—15.)—The righteous Lord can take no pleasure in the workers of iniquity, however they may be distinguished: if those, who are young in years, be old in wickedness, they may expect the more speedy punishment: nor will he spare the impenitent, however otherwise entitled to commiseration.—Hypocrisy, or impiety, is commonly connected with dishonesty and deceitful insinuation; and when these become general, they mark a people ripe for destruction: for this is a fire which will consume all before it.—The vengeance of God is frequently executed on men by means of their own iniquities: and in times of public calamity, the rich and noble are only distinguished from the poor, as the lofty cedars are from the briars and thorns, when the whole forest is destroyed by one general conflagration. But all that can be suffered on earth, from the anger of the Lord, is but a shadow of the wrath to come: and the enraged and furious discord to which men have sometimes been given up, when suffering for their sins, to the increase of their own and each other’s torment, suggests to the mind a horrid idea of the misery of the wicked in another world; when, bereft of all hope and comfort, and enduring the fiery wrath of God, every one will be tormented by his own conscience, and express without restraint all his malignant passions; and so enhance the anguish and vexation of his fellow-sufferers. Blessed be God for “Jesus Christ, who ‘delivereth us from the wrath to come!’”

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—4. These verses belong to the subject of the preceding chapter: yet they are so expressed, as to include the rulers and magistrates of the Jews, as well as those in Israel; and indeed those of every nation who pervert authority in a similar way. (Note, ix. 8—12.) The persons, whose conduct drew on them the denounced woe, enacted laws which authorized grievous oppression, and decided causes in the most iniquitous manner: and their edicts and decrees were enrolled by the scribes and writers, and prescribed for rules and precedents in the inferior courts. This was purposely done, in order that they might rob the poor, and seize upon the property of the orphans and widows, under colour of law and justice. (Notes, i. 16—20. iii. 12—15. 1 Kings xxi. 8—14. Ps. xciv. 1—7. 20, 21. Am. v. 10—13. Mic. ii. 1—5. iii. 8—12. vii. 1—4.)—The Lord, indeed, still acknowledged Israel as his people. He had yet a small remnant, especially among the poor, who were peculiarly exposed to these oppressions. But he was about to send the Assyrians from afar to execute his vengeance, and what would the oppressors do in those desolations? whither would they flee for safety? or to whose keeping would they commit their ill-gotten riches, in which they gloried, and with which they then lived in splendour and luxury? (Notes, ii. 19—21. Prov. x. 2, 3. xi. 4. Jam. v. 1—6.) For the Lord would certainly withdraw his protection: and then the very prisoners, or men who had been mortally wounded and left among the slain, would prevail against them. (Jer. xxxvii. 10.) These strong expressions denote how easily and certainly they would be ruined, by the continued anger and powerful vengeance of God.—Day of visitation. (3) Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Gen. xxi. 1, 2. Jer. x. 12—15, v. 15.

V. 5, 6. The prophet here enters on another subject: and some think that this prediction was delivered after the ruin of Samaria, in the reign of Hezekiah; because Sennacherib is introduced, boasting of what he had done to that city. But perhaps this also was spoken prophetically, as what the Lord foreknew he would say, when marching against Jerusalem: and this prophecy might have been delivered, when Ahaz was depending on the assistance of the king of Assyria; both to warn the people of their danger from that quarter, and to encourage them to place their confidence in God. (Note, 2 Kings xvi. 7—9.) He here pointed out the Assyrian king, as the rod with which he meant to correct his offending people; and his righteous indignation was the staff, with which that prince would beat and bruise them. “The staff, that is in their hand, is my indignation.” (Notes, 15. xiv. 3—6. Ps. xvii. 13—15, v. 14. cxxv. 3. Jer. li. 20—25.) For God would send that insolent conqueror against a nation, which professed to worship him, but which was generally ungodly; the most of whom would comply with Hezekiah’s reformation, in a hypocritical manner. And he would commission him to take the spoil and prey, and to debase and trample upon them as if they were the very mire of the streets. (Notes, xxv. 10—12. li. 21—23. Mic. vii. 8—10.) “God often ‘prosperes wicked and tyrannical governments to be his ‘scourge, and the instruments of his vengeance upon ‘others: and when they have done the work which God ‘allotted them, he then punishes them for those very oppressions, which they have exercised against their neighbours, and to which they were carried on purely by their ‘own ambition and covetousness; although Providence ‘made them serviceable to better ends and purposes.’ Lowth.

11 Shall I not, ^z as I have done unto Samaria and her idols, so do to Jerusalem and her idols?

12 Wherefore it shall come to pass, that ^a when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem, ^b I will ^c punish the fruit of ^d the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and ^e the glory of his high looks.

13 ^f For he saith, By the strength of my hand I have done it; and by my wisdom, for I am prudent: and ^g I have removed the bounds of the people, and have ^h robbed their treasures, and I have put down the inhabitants like ⁱ a valiant man:

14 And ^j my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people: and as one gathereth eggs that are left, have I gathered all the earth; and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped.

V. 7. The Lord would give Sennacherib power and success, and use him as his instrument in the work assigned him: but Sennacherib would not do it, because the Lord commanded him, or as his willing servant. He had no intention or inclination of that kind; but was actuated entirely by enormous ambition, rapacity, and cruelty.—‘The wickedness of the facts being altogether their own; and ‘the good ends served by them to be wholly ascribed to God.’ Lowth. (2 Kings ix. 7. Hos. i. 4.) ‘Here is declared the ‘difference of the work of God, and of the wicked, in one ‘very thing and act: for God’s intention is to chastise ‘them for their amendment; and the Assyrians’ is to destroy them, to enrich themselves: thus, in respect of ‘God’s judgment, it is God’s work; but, in respect of ‘their own malice, it is the work of the devil.’ (Notes, xlvii. 6. Gen. 1. 20. Ps. lxxvi. 10. Acts ii. 22—24. iv. 23—28.)

V. 8—11. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. xix.) Sennacherib proudly deemed his princes, or his vassals, or tributaries, altogether equal to other kings, as it was common at that time for a conqueror to be styled “king of kings.” He had subjected one kingdom after another, and none of their deities had been able to defend them against him; (Marg. Ref. s—u;) yet their images were more splendid than any to be found in Jerusalem: he therefore supposed that he should easily conquer that city and her idols; either numbering JEHOVAH among them, or utterly disregarding him. (Note, 2 Chr. xxxii. 15.)—Shalmaneser took and destroyed Samaria; but probably Sennacherib had some share in the victory, the whole honour of which he arrogated to himself. (Note, 2 Kings xvii. 1—6.)

V. 12—14. (Notes, 28—34. xiv. 24—27. 2 Kings xix. 22. 25. 35—37.) This haughty conqueror supposed, that his success was wholly owing to the number and valour of his troops, and to his own wise and prudent conduct and extraordinary courage. (Notes, Ez. xxviii. 2—5. 12—15. Dan. iv. 28—37. v. 18—28.) The taking and plundering of cities was to him like gathering eggs, when the timorous bird has flown away and left them: and so sure and easy was his success, that no one even dared to interrupt him, or to complain of him; or so much as to come and see what was going forward. (Marg. Ref. h.)

V. 15. (Note, 5, 6.) These animated interrogations have a peculiar energy. JEHOVAH as much employed the power which he had given to Sennacherib for certain purposes, as a man does a tool which he has formed for that use. But could an axe be conceived to glory over him, who hewed with it? or a saw, to menace him who moved it? or a rod, him that corrected another with it? or a staff, as if it were not mere wood, to strike the man who used it? The absurdity in these instances would not be greater, than it was for Sennacherib to vaunt himself against JEHOVAH; on whom he was far more dependent, and to whom he was immensely more inferior, than the axe or the saw to him who used them. Yet, ignorant of him by whom he lived and moved, and forgetful of his own weakness, he defied the God of Israel, and expected to overcome him! (Notes, xlv. 9, 10. Rom. ix. 19—21.)

No wood.] ‘The Hebrews have a peculiar way of joining the negative particle al to a noun, to signify in a strong manner a total negation of the thing expressed ‘by the noun.’ Bp. Lowth. (Job xxvi. 2, 3. Am. vi. 13. Heb.)

V. 16—19. To convince the proud worm of his madness, and to promote his own glory, the Lord determined to enfeeble his overgrown power and prosperity, and to consume his stoutest commanders and forces, and all that in which he gloried. For the holy Protector and Light of Israel, would be a fire to destroy the Assyrian army, as “briers and thorns;” and he would level them to the ground as a conflagration does the forest, or the crop of corn: yea, he would destroy them, both “soul and body,” absolutely and finally; and the desolations would be as “when a standard-bearer fainteth,” and all who followed his standard are put to confusion, and cut in pieces. So that the few men, who should remain of that army, which had been numerous as the trees in a large forest, might be numbered and registered even by a child. (Notes, ix. 18—21. xxx. 29—33. xxxiii. 10—13. 2 Kings xix. 35—37. Nah. i. 9—13.)

V. 20. The Jews and Israelites were wont to rely on the assistance of the neighbouring nations, and they were smitten by them one after another. Under Ahaz they sought the protection of the Assyrians, who were employed to correct or punish them. (Notes, vii. 17—19. 1 Kings xvi. 7—9.) But the remnant who escaped Sennacherib’s ravages, by the miraculous interposition of God, would renounce these vain confidences, and learn in truth to rely on “the Holy One of Israel;” for they would not only return to their habitations, from which the invaders had driven them, but to the worship and service of God also.—‘The expression “in that day,” is not always confined to ‘the time last spoken of, but often signifies some time ‘that shall be remarkable for God’s mercy toward ‘his people. ... Here it seems to point at that signal ‘time, when there shall be a general conversion of the ‘Jews to God.’ Lowth. (Notes, 21—23. i. 7—9. iv. 2—6. xvii. 4—8. l. 10, 11. 2 Kings xix. 4. 30, 31. Rom. xi. 1—6.)

V. 21—23. The original of “a remnant shall return,” is Shear-jashub, the name given to one of Isaiah’s sons, in confirmation of the perpetuity of God’s promises. (Note, vii. 3.) The descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, according to the promises of God, were indeed become numerous as “the sand of the sea:” yet in general they had forsaken him; and no more than a remnant, even on this great occasion, would return to him. Not only did Sennacherib execute vengeance on many of the people; but further judgments were decreed, and predicted, which, in strict and awful justice, would make them desolate for their sins: for the Lord had determined to make a consumption of the people throughout the land. The use, which the apostle makes of this passage shews that the Holy Spirit intended likewise to foretel more important events; even the conversion of a remnant of the Jews to Christ, and the execution of righteous vengeance upon the bulk of the nation which rejected him. V. 24—26. See Rom. xi. 7. 28.' Lowth.—The other inhabitants of Judea seem to have suffered very grievous things from the Assyrian invaders; while Jerusalem, or Zion, and those who took shelter there, were preserved. (Notes, 28—34. xxxiii. 5—22. 2 Kings xix. 30, 31.) Sennacherib and the Assyrians, (after the manner of Pharaoh and the Egyptians,) threatened the entire destruction of Israel; but in a very short time it would appear, that the Lord's anger against his people was turned away, by the destruction of their enemies: in the same manner, as he destroyed the Midianitish oppressors by the enfeebled Israelites, and overwhelmed Pharaoh and the Egyptians in the Red Sea. (Notes, ix. 4, 5. Ex. xiv. 21—31. Judg. vii. 16—25.)

V. 27. *Marg. But without question the Messiah,

'the Anointed in an eminent sense ..., is principally intended here. ... God preserved the kingdom of Judah from utter destruction, because the Messiah was to come from that tribe.' Lowth.—'The yoke of servitude shall be taken from thy neck, because thou art a people consecrated to me, for the sake of that Messiah, mine Anointed, which shall descend from thee.' Bp. Hall.—'Because of the promise made to that kingdom, whereby Christ's kingdom was prefigured.'

V. 28—34. These verses contain a prophetic description of Sennacherib's march towards Jerusalem, when he desolated all before him, and threatened that city with immediate destruction. The consternation and flight of the inhabitants of the cities, near to Jerusalem, is also represented in a very animated and sublime manner. But when he was come almost to the walls of the city, and began to "shake his hand against the daughter of Zion," as menacing her destruction, with a special enmity to the temple and the worship there performed; the Lord, in whom Hezekiah trusted, lopped off the spreading branches of this cedar with dreadful terror: he slew by "a mighty one," an angel of his strength, all his valiant captains; and he cut down a hundred and eighty-five thousand of his soldiers, like the hewing down of a forest. (Notes, 16—19. Dan. iv. 10—18. 20—26.) Thus his army, which resembled Lebanon covered with stately cedars, fell at once, to the confusion of its haughty leader, and the grateful and triumphant joy of Hezekiah and his people. The places here mentioned, were all in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem; most of them within a few miles to the north and west. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Injustice and oppression are most atrocious when sanctioned or prescribed by law; and a tremendous woe is denounced against all those who enact iniquitous statutes, or decree injustice from the seat of the magistrate. The more indigent and destitute the persons are, who are thus robbed, the deeper is the guilt of their oppressors; and when persecution “for righteousness’ sake,” is added, it speedily fills up the measure of national guilt.—Even in temporal calamities, tyrants and persecutors know not how to secure that power, pomp, or affluence, which they account “their glory;” (Gen. xxxi;) or even their own lives: and if the Lord withdraw his protection, the most despicable instruments will execute deserved vengeance on them. But what will sinners do, whither will they flee, and what will their glory avail them, in the approaching day of judgment?—When the Lord intends to desolate nations, or to chastise his people, he sometimes arms with power, and renders successful, the basest of men; and commissions them to smite those who have provoked his anger. He purposes to destroy the most criminal, and to excite others to repentance: the instruments however do not seek his glory, but their own; and count it their pleasure to destroy, and to “cut off nations not a few.”—The lust of dominion renders men callous to the feelings of humanity: and, forgetful that they are the creatures and subjects of the Almighty, authority, power, and success inflate their minds with increasing arrogance; and, whilst they ascribe all their achievements to their own prowess and conduct, they suppose that nothing can stop their progress: nay, they can be so infatuated, as to “exalt themselves above all that is called God and is worshipped;” and to suppose themselves able to overcome the deities, as well as the kings, of opposing nations!—How lamentable was it, that Jerusalem, which was single and unrivalled in her relation to JEHOVAH, should set up graven images, in which she was excelled by all the heathen cities! and it is equally foolish for Christians to emulate the people of the world, in those vanities, in which they will always be eclipsed. (Note, Ez. xv. 6—8. P. O.)—The Lord allots to every man his part, in fulfilling his grand designs. When any one serves him humbly and willingly, He graciously recompenses his faith and obedience: but those, who unintentionally perform his purposes, are influenced by corrupt motives, and will be punished for their sins.—Men’s words and works are “the fruit of their hearts,” whether they be good or bad; and those “high looks,” which are admired as full of dignity and glory, being the fruit of a “stout heart,” will expose a man to divine judgments. (Note, xlvii. 7—10.)—When mighty conquerors are cut off in the very crisis of their success, the event often occasions various conjectures, suspicions, and speculations: but in fact they have done their whole work, and are ripe for divine vengeance, and therefore the Lord stops their career: and this has often taken place, when they have been glorying in success, and anticipating fresh triumphs! Such overgrown murderers, robbers, and scourges of mankind, think the horrors and miseries of war a mere pastime: they act as if the wealth of the world were created for them alone, and as if every man deserved death, who was not willing to be their slave: and we need not wonder that the lives of thousands are so vile in their esteem; when the God, in whom they live and move, and from whom they have all their power and success, is most entirely despised by them. Instead of his instruments, they affect to be his rivals; and, forgetful how easily he can crush them, they set themselves against him. But when the Lord of Hosts is pleased to repress their insolence, he can soon thin their ranks, either by the sword of an enemy, or by famine and pestilence. And “the Light of Israel” will be a fire to consume all the dignity, prosperity, and multitude of “the workers of iniquity,” “both soul and body.” Some few indeed escape the most tremendous temporal judgments: but not a single impenitent sinner will escape the wrath to come. Then even the standard-bearers of infidelity and impiety will utterly faint, and doubtless all their legions will be driven into “the blackness of darkness for ever.”

V. 20—34.

Scarcely in any age or place, is there more than a remnant, who “stay upon the Holy One of Israel in truth.” (Note, xlviii. 1, 2.) Most professed Christians still cleave to sin, and stay themselves on the world, though often troubled and injured by it: but, blessed be God, that there is a remnant who return to Him: may we be found of that happy number! Then, while we expect his righteous judgments, according to his word, to overflow the profane and hypocritical multitudes, we may dwell in Zion, fearless of every enemy and catastrophe: (Notes, xxxiii. 15—19;) nay, even the corrections which we receive by the hands of wicked men, who are the rod of our Father, will ere long cease, in the execution of his indignation on them for their crimes. (Note, Ps. cxxv. 3.)—All former judgments on proud oppressors have been and are only specimens of the final ruin, reserved for the enemies of God. “Because of the anointing” of our great Redeemer, the yoke of every antichrist must be broken from off his church: and if our souls partake of the unction of his Holy Spirit, our complete and eternal deliverance is ensured to us. In the mean time, whilst our enemies defy “the daughter of Zion,” and seem to make swift progress in their attempts against her; let us not yield to unbelieving fears. The Lord, in his own time, by his own hand, or by some instrument, endued with power from on high, will bring down his most exalted and haughty enemies: and all opposition shall fall before him, and his cause shall finally prevail and triumph.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. The transition, from the temporal deliverances of Israel to that spiritual redemption from which they all originated, is very common in the prophetic writings. Sennacherib's chieftains and army were like the unnumbered stately cedars of Lebanon; but speedily cut down by a mighty one. But the extraordinary Person here predicted, would resemble a tender shoot from the decayed root of a tree which had been cut down; and yet he attained to the highest exaltation. Some think that the prophecy had reference to Hezekiah, or Zerubbabel, as types of Christ. But Hezekiah was born long before it was delivered; and there was nothing in the state of the Jews under Zerubbabel, answerable to the glorious things spoken in the sequel of this chapter: so that it must be entirely a prophecy of Christ, and can accord to no other. (Notes, liii. 2, 3. Zech. vi. 12, 13. Rev. xxii. 16, 17.)—The prophet spake of the Messiah, as springing from the root of Jesse, rather than from that of David, because Jesse lived and died in a private station; but David was a prosperous monarch: and when all the glory of his family seemed to be like the withered trunk or stump of a tree, a tender shoot or rod would spring forth, in which that glory would revive, increase, and be established for ever; and which would indeed become "a Plant of renown." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Ez. xvii. 22—24. xxxiv. 23—31. Rom. xv. 8—13.) 'We have here a remarkable instance of that method so common with the prophets, and particularly with Isaiah, of taking occasion from the mention of some great temporal deliverance, to launch out into the display of the spiritual deliverance of God's people by the Messiah: for that this prophecy relates to the Messiah, we have the express authority of St. Paul. Rom. xv. 12.' Bp. Lowth.

V. 2—5. The human nature of Christ was formed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, in the womb of the virgin; and all his power, wisdom, and holiness, as Man, are ascribed to the same divine influence; for the Holy "Spirit" "was not given by measure unto him." (Notes, xlii. 1—4. lix. 20, 21. lxi. 1—3. John i. 30—34. iii. 27—36, v. 34. Acts i. 1—3.) The varied expressions here used, denote the manifold endowments of the human nature of Christ, for the work which he had undertaken, and the fulness treasured up in him for his people. Every kind of divine knowledge and sagacity, of wisdom and prudence, of piety and courage; of holy affections and spiritual relish for heavenly things, and delight in them; of vigour and strength of mind for obedience, and for suffering with unabated courage, zeal, and patience: whatever was requisite for the exercise of his personal ministry, attended with numerous and extraordinary miracles on earth, or for that of his mediatorial kingdom in heaven, to the end of time, are comprised in the expressions before us. So perfect would be his knowledge, wisdom, and justice, that he would in no case judge by appearances or report; but would distinguish characters, and decide causes, with the most exact discernment and impartiality. He would be the Protector of the poor and needy, especially of his poor and humble people, and plead for them against oppressors: and, while he saved all those who submitted to him, he would destroy the enemies of his kingdom, by denouncing and executing vengeance upon them; as if an iron rod proceeded from his mouth to dash them in pieces, or as if his breath were a flame of fire to devour them. (Notes, xxx. 27, 28. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12, v. 8. Rev. xix. 11—16, v. 15.) His consummate righteousness and faithfulness likewise would establish him on the throne, prepare him for filling it in the most perfect manner, and be the ornament and glory of it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lix. 16—19. Ps. lxxii. 1—7. 12—14.) The general character of the Redeemer, and the manner, in which he would exercise his authority, with the effects produced by it, to the end of time, are here stated; rather than any special events predicted.—The Spirit of knowledge, &c. (2) "Of the knowledge and fear of the LORD." "Of knowledge and godliness." Sept.—Reprove, &c. (3) Note, Prov. xxxi. 8, 9.—"With equity" "shall he work conviction in the meek of the earth." Bp. Lowth. (Note, Ps. xxv. 8, 9.)

Faithfulness, &c. (5) 'The expression implies here, that a strict regard to truth, integrity, and justice, will be the honour of Christ's kingdom. (Eph. vi. 14.) On the contrary antichrist is described, as coming "with all deceit," "ceivableness of unrighteousness," or all the arts of unrighteous deceit. (2 Thes. ii. 9.) And without question, nothing has more tended to the corrupting the truth of the gospel, or weakening the power of it, than the giving encouragement to pious frauds and forgeries.' Lowth.

V. 6—9. (Marg. Ref.—Note, ix. 6, 7.) The effects of divine grace on the minds of men, in the times of the Messiah, are here represented, with much beauty, under the most significant emblems. Persons of the most dissimilar dispositions and pursuits, and by nature and custom addicted to various kinds of wickedness, would be so changed by the grace of the gospel, that they would become of “one heart, and of one way.” (Notes, Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Acts ii. 44—47.) The selfish, the penurious, the rapacious, the contentious, the ambitious, the savage, the subtle, and the malicious, would lose their peculiar base dispositions, and become harmless, sincere, peaceable, benevolent, and affectionate; they would live together in harmony, hearken to instruction, and be guided by gentle persuasions and intreaties. So that the change would be as evident and surprising, as if the wolf, the tiger, the lion, the bear, and other fierce carnivorous animals, should learn to be gentle and harmless as the lamb, the kid, the calf, or the cow; to associate with them, to graze the pasture as they do, or to feed on hay and straw; and should be so tractable that a little child could lead them. Or, as if the asp and the cockatrice should no longer be disposed to bite with envenomed teeth; but should be so inoffensive, that infants might safely play by their holes: for there would be no more a disposition in the inhabitants of Zion, the true church of Christ, to hurt or destroy: and the knowledge of the Lord, with all its sanctifying effects, should at length cover the whole earth, “even as the waters cover the sea.” (Notes, lv. 12, 13, lxv. 24, 25. Lev. i. 1, 2. xi. 2. Acts x. 9—16.)—Such changes, as are here described, may be imagined, but they never actually take place, in the literal sense. Every creature on earth, man alone excepted, continues from first to last, of that disposition, and retains unchanged those propensities, which belong to its nature. But in those of the human race, who are “born of God,” an entire change and revolution is effected, in their propensities, desires, affections, and pursuits: they become “new creatures,” “all old things pass away, behold all things are become new;” and “they walk in newness of life.” The emblem is completely answered; the figurative description realized. (Notes, John iii. 3. 2 Cor. v. 17.) The fables and imaginations of the gentiles, of a golden age, and the return of it in the latter days, in which some of their writers use not dissimilar expressions, but inferior in beauty and energy, seem to have been taken from the scriptural account of Adam in paradise, and from the predictions of the Messiah's happy reign.—To suppose that the Holy Spirit, by this decisive language, foretold events no way answerable to their exact meaning; and that they are merely highly wrought figures of speech, like those of uninspired eastern poets; and suited to raise expectations in simple hearted believers, which must be eternally disappointed, savours too much of infidelity, not to say blasphemy, to deserve a serious refutation. The earth has never yet been “full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea;” and therefore the grand accomplishment of the prophecy has not yet taken place. (Marg. Ref. q.—Notes, Hab. ii. 12—14, v. 14.)

V. 10. (Notes, 1. x. 20.) When the gospel began to be publicly preached, the divine Saviour, as springing from the root of Jesse, and as crucified for sinners, ascended into heaven, and, being exalted to the mediatorial throne, stood as an ensign to which the chosen people of God resorted. (Notes, 11—16. lix. 16—19, v. 19. Gen. xlix. 10. Matt. xi. 28—30. John iii. 14, 15. xii. 27—33, v. 32.) The gentiles sought to him as their Lord and Saviour; and “the rest of soul,” which they found by trusting in him, was connected with the glory and beauty of holiness, and an earnest of the glory of heaven. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lx. 1—3. lxvi. 19—23.) Or rather, the Saviour would rest with full complacency in his redeemed people, chiefly from among the gentiles, in whom his name would be exceedingly glorified. (Ps. cxxxii. 8. 13. Note, Rom. xv. 8—13, v. 12.)—Root of Jesse.] Notes, liii. 2, 3. Rev. v. 5—7, v. 5. xxii. 16, 17, v. 16.

V. 11—16. The Lord recovered a remnant of his people from Assyria and Babylon, by the same power with which he had brought the whole nation out of Egypt: and it is here predicted, that he would “set his hand again the second time,” to gather those, who would be left of them, from all nations whither they had been scattered; and several of the adjacent countries, and some very distant ones in different directions, are specified. By “the islands of the sea,” all the regions separated from Asia are generally meant; and here the British isles are included. (Note, Gen. x. 2—5.)—The crucified Saviour, doubtless, as held forth in the preaching of the gospel, is that Ensign to which he will assemble “the outcasts of Israel, and the dispersed of Judah,” from the four corners of the earth. United in dependence on “the Prince of Peace,” and in obedience to him, that envy, competition, and enmity, which so long kept the Jews and Israelites at variance, shall be finally terminated; (Notes, Jer. iii. 16—18, v. 18. Ez. xxxvii. 15—28. Hos. i. 11. Zech. xi. 12—14, v. 14;) their adversaries shall be cut off, and many of their former enemies shall be subjected, or willingly submit and become tributary to them, or powerfully assist them, which seems implied in the expression, “they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines towards the west” (14). For the Lord will then remove all obstacles, by the same powerful interposition, which he vouchsafed in behalf of Israel, when he separated “the Tongue,” or Bay of the Egyptian or Red Sea, and destroyed that hindrance to their departure: and, “with a mighty wind,” he will so separate the waters of the river, (Euphrates,) in all its streams, that men may pass over dry shod. (Notes, Dan. xi. 40—45. Zech. x. 5—12. Rev. xvi. 12—16.) Thus a highway shall be made for Israel’s return, as there was for their ancestors to pass from Egypt unto Canaan.—“This part of the chapter contains a prophecy, which certainly remains yet to be accomplished.” Bp. Lowth.—“This chapter contains a general prophecy of the advancement Christ’s kingdom should make in the world. But as this advancement is made by different steps and degrees; so the several parts of the prophecy may be supposed to point at different ages and periods of time. ... And I take this part of the chapter ... to foretel those glorious times of the church, which shall be ushered in by the restoration of the Jewish nation; when they shall embrace the gospel, and be restored to their own country from the several dispersions where they are scattered. This remarkable scene of Providence is plainly foretold by most of the prophets of the Old Testament, and by St. Paul in the New.” Lowth. (*Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The descent, from the summit of earthly grandeur to the abyss of misery, is not uncommon. But heavenly honour and prosperity advance gradually from small beginnings, and will increase for ever: (Notes, ix. 6, 7, v. 7. Dan. ii. 44, 45:) and the cause of God is not rendered triumphant by human power, but “by the Spirit of the LORD.” (Note, Zech. iv. 4—7.) Thus the great Head of the Church sprang up as a tender shoot; and was scarcely observed at first, or observed only to be disdained: but, through his external meanness, when “in the form of a servant,” a divine glory shone forth. His holy life, his stupendous miracles, his boundless knowledge and heavenly wisdom, and all his words and works proclaimed, that “the Spirit of the LORD rested upon him,” for all the purposes here predicted by his holy prophet. And now in human nature he reigns upon a glorious throne, the Lord and Judge of his church, and of the world; and all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, of grace and truth, of power and might, yea, “all the fulness of the Godhead dwell in him.” (Notes, Col. ii. 1—9.) Thus gloriously exalted, and qualified most completely to fill up the mediatorial throne, he is the Patron of the poor and oppressed; for the lowly and broken hearted alone truly submit to him, and value his salvation: and, while he pleads their cause, he will execute his severest threatenings on all the workers of iniquity; yet with exact discrimination and strict justice: for “righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins.”—“From his fulness all” his people “receive, and grace for grace.” (Note, John i. 16.) So that the same Spirit is communicated to each of them in their measure: and thus they too learn sound wisdom and discretion; they become acquainted with God and themselves, with his truths, and their own duty, interests, dangers, and security; they are rendered prudent to shun, or strong to resist, the temptations of Satan; they learn to fear and love the Lord; and, with increasing experience and spirituality, they become “of quick understand"ing" in "discerning good and evil:" they are formed to the same judgment with him, whose Spirit they receive; they learn to follow his example of goodness, truth, and purity; and, in a subordinate sense, righteousness and faithfulness become their girdle also. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28-31. 2 Cor. vi. 3-10. Eph. v. 10-17.) Let us seek diligently for more and more of this heavenly wisdom and good understanding; and be contented to want that knowledge and discernment, which the world admires and idolizes.

V. 6-9.

As far as we are taught by the Spirit of Christ, the predominant obliquities of our fallen nature will be corrected; and those hateful and mischievous vices, by which men resemble the most pernicious of the animals in their worst qualities, will be subdued and mortified; and we shall be rendered harmless, peaceable, sincere, kind, liberal, and ready to renounce our own interest or pleasure, in order to do good to others. For, the grace of Christ is a sovereign remedy for every one of our mental disorders: and though none of them are here perfectly healed; all of them are dethroned, hated, opposed and crucified, and no one habitually prevails: but the believer's desires, pleasures, and leading aims are totally changed; and thus they, who before conversion were of the most opposite characters, now assimilate to each other, and learn to concur in the same purposes and endeavours, and live in holy peace and love. Every one of them becomes teachable and forgiving: they no longer are disposed to hurt, or destroy, or deceive; but they learn to forbear and to forgive, their hearts are enlarged, and they become the friends of mankind, because they are the redeemed servants of Jesus Christ. But alas! how many professors of evangelical truth, by their avarice, contention, pride, and ferocity, evince, that they are strangers to this gracious change; and that they still continue wolves, tigers, or serpents; and have not been "transformed in the renewing of their minds" into lambs and doves! How many leave the matter doubtful both to themselves and others, and often disgrace that doctrine which they should adorn! How little has this tendency of the gospel yet appeared in the world! We cannot then entertain a doubt, that far more conspicuous and glorious effects are to be expected; when "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea;" when wars and furious contests shall cease, and all nations shall know the power of the gospel, to teach men to love God and one another. In the mean time let us aim to manifest this spirit and conduct in our narrow circle, as far as we are able; that our example and endeavours may in some feeble measure promote the honour of Christ, and stop the mouths of gain-sayers. And, as few Christians are able to do much good by engaging the enemies of the gospel, in a way of disputa-

V. 10-16.

By embracing the Christian religion, we enlist under the standard of the cross of Christ; that by our profession of his truth, by our good works, and our fervent prayers, we may obtain peaceful conquests over our enemies, by winning them over to our side, and inducing them to have fellowship with us. (Note, 1 John i. 3, 4.) Of old "the banner" was displayed, and both Jews and Gentiles sought to it, and found a glorious rest to their souls, by trusting and obeying the King of saints. For us the same ensign is erected and exhibited: may we also thankfully flock to it, and share these blessings. And while we expect the Lord to set to his hand again, to gather his ancient people from their dispersions, and to bring them home to his church; and also to bring in the fulness of the Gentiles, when all parties will cease from envy and strife, and be united in holy love: let us trust in his glorious power to remove out of the way all the hindrances to our complete salvation; let us tread in the highway of holiness, which he has made for his redeemed; (Note, xxxv. 8-10;) let us "wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life;" and let us expect that the Lord will prepare our way through death, that river which separates this from the eternal world, that we may "pass over dry shod;" even as he dried up the Red Sea and Jordan, when "he led forth his people with joy, "and his chosen with gladness," to give them the land of Canaan for their inheritance.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) Whatever accommodations may be made of this sacred hymn; as it is immediately connected with the prophecy in the former chapter, it evidently predicts, that the converted nation of Israel, reflecting upon their past condition for so long a time, because of the anger of God against them for their obstinate rejection of their Messiah; and exulting in the glorious change which had taken place; shall break out in the language of the prophet, "O LORD, I will praise thee, &c." (Notes, lxiii. 15-19. lxiv. 1-12.)—"I will give thanks unto thee, O JEHOVAH, for though thou hast been angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou hast comforted me. ... misery, was only a shadow of the redemption of the church from sin and Satan. This whole salvation results from the infinite love and mercy of God the Father: it was contrived by his infinite wisdom; and rests on his infinite power, and truth. It is altogether communicated through the person and mediation of Immanuel; and it is applied by the new-creating power of God the Spirit: so that in every sense, God is the Salvation of his church. Thus JAH-JEHOVAH, the eternal God, is become the Saviour of the world: and is, "in Christ" the Support, Protector, and Friend of the church, and of every believer; as he becomes his Salvation, from the moment, when he is enabled to receive and rely on him, as such. (Notes, vii. 14. ix. 6, 7. xlv. 15—17. 20—25. Ps. xxvii. 1—3. lxxviii. 4. Luke i. 46—55, v. 47. Tit. ii. 9—14. iii. 4—7.)

V. 3. The purifying, fertilizing, and consolatory influences of the Holy Spirit are commonly denoted, under the emblem of springing water. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlix. 9—13. Ex. xvii. 5, 6. John iv. 10—15. vii. 37—39.) This water flows through the mediatory work of Christ, and is conveyed to the souls of men by the ordinances of God's worship. When the gospel is preached in any place, "wells of salvation" are opened, which communicate with the Fountain of life in Christ: and in the predicted times, this Fountain of life and these "wells of salvation," though long hidden from Israel, will be discovered to them, and they will praise God with joyful hearts. (Note, Zech. xiii. 1.)—"The Jews themselves seem to have applied it to the 'times of the Messiah. On the last day of the feast of 'tabernacles, they fetched water in a golden pitcher, from 'the fountain of Siloah, springing at the foot of mount 'Zion, without the city: they brought it through the 'water-gate into the temple, and poured it, mixed with 'wine, on the sacrifice as it lay upon the altar, with great 'rejoicing. ...Our Saviour applied the ceremony, and the 'intention of it, to himself, and to the effusion of the Holy 'Spirit, promised, and to be given, by him.' Bp. Lowth."

V. 4—6. In the day, when the Lord shall do so great things for his church; his people shall excite each other to praise him for the past, and to call on him for all that yet remains to be done: or, they will "proclaim his "name" and perfections, as well as "declare his doings "among the people," and expatiate on his wonders wrought in their behalf, that "his name may be exalted." (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7.) Thus the excellent things done for the Jews and Israelites, being celebrated and made known to all the earth, will, probably, be one grand means of bringing in "the fulness of the Gentiles:" while the inhabitants of Zion, the church converted from that chosen race, will cry aloud and shout for joy; and all shall see the triumphant power of the Holy One of Israel, in the wonders wrought in their behalf. (Notes, xxx. 20—26. Zeph. iii.

14—20. Zech. ii. 10—13. Rom. xi. 11—15. 22—36.) "When ye shall draw waters with joy from the fountains of salvation; in that day ye shall say: Give ye thanks to "JEHOVAH; Call upon his name, make known among "the peoples his mighty deeds." Bp. Lowth. "The peoples," plural; that is, the nations of the earth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every one of those, who now have peace with God, was once exposed to his righteous anger; and most of them experienced many painful effects from it, and dreaded others far more tremendous. But when the awakened and humbled sinner finds pardon and peace, through the atoning blood of Christ, he with thankful heart exclaims, "O "LORD, I will praise thee: though thou wast angry with "me, thine anger is turned away, and thou hast comforted "me."—Yet alas! we are prone to relapse into transgression: and then our heavenly Father is angry with us and frowns upon us; he bereaves us of our comforts, and inflicts sharp corrections. When these bring us to mourn for our sins, and to renew repentance and humble faith, his "anger will be turned away," our comforts will be restored, and our hearts again tuned to celebrate his praises. All these our hopes and comforts are vouchsafed to us sinful creatures, because "God is become our Salvation:" and when we rest all our hopes on this Foundation, "we "may trust, and not be afraid." For as God was manifested in the flesh; and as Immanuel died for our sins, when we were enemies; he will doubtless be the Strength and complete Salvation of all, who believe in him, and love, and obey him, and whom he now numbers among his friends. Having JEHOVAH, the eternal God, for our "Strength and Song," we may bid defiance to all our enemies: and though we must encounter difficulties, endure hardships, and experience sharp conflicts; we have "wells "of salvation" opened on every side; and, drawing from them the waters of life and consolation, by faith and prayer, we may rejoice in the midst of tribulation, and find some foretastes of heaven, in communion with the Lord in this outward sanctuary. (Notes, Rom. v. 1—11.) The more diligently we attend on the means of grace, and the larger supplies we derive from the Fountain of salvation; the more fervent will be our praises of God our Saviour. The glories of his character, and the excellency of all his wonderful works, especially that of our redemption, will be our favourite theme. We shall ardently desire that his name should be universally extolled; and that his inestimable salvation should be known to all the earth. Whilst our hearts rejoice, that the Holy God "dwelleth in Zion" upon a mercy-seat, the Friend of sinners who seek unto him, and the almighty Protector of his church; we shall be ready to shout for joy as victors, even when we are

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. The word rendered "burden," (though some translate it "the oracle,") seems to denote the heavy vengeance predicted; which was seen in vision by the prophet, as if already falling upon Babylon. (Marg.
Ref. a.—Note, Jer. xxiii. 33—40.) 'These two chapters, '(striking off the five last verses of the latter, which belong 'to a far different subject,) contain one entire prophecy, 'foretelling the destruction of Babylon by the Medes and 'Persians, delivered probably in the reign of Ahaz, ... about 'two hundred years before the completion of it. The 'captivity itself of the Jews at Babylon, (which the pro'phet does not expressly foretel, but supposes, in the 'spirit of prophecy, as what was actually to be effected,)
'did not fully take place till about one hundred and thirty 'years after the delivery of this prophecy: and the Medes,
'who are expressly mentioned (17), as the principal agents
'in the overthrow of the Babylonian monarchy, by which 'the Jews were released from that captivity, were at this 'time an inconsiderable people; having been in a state of 'anarchy ever since the fall of the great Assyrian empire,
'of which they had made a part, under Sardanapalus; and 'did not become a kingdom under Deioces till about the 'seventeenth of Hezekiah. The former part of this pro'phesy is one of the most beautiful examples, that can be 'given, of elegance of composition, variety of imagery, and 'sublimity of sentiment and diction, in the prophetick
'style: and the latter part consists of an ode of supreme 'and singular excellence.' Bp. Lowth.—The Jews had hitherto had little acquaintance with the Chaldeans: that empire was, at the time when this prophecy was uttered, inferior to that of the Assyrians, if it did not constitute a part of it; and it was several years after, that the kings of Babylon obtained the ascendancy, and their empire supplanted and swallowed up that of the Assyrians. (Notes, xxiii. 13. 2 Kings xx. 12, 13. 17, 18. xxiii. 29, 30. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11.) Some intimations, however, had been given the Jews of their danger from that quarter: and indeed all the predictions of the prophets, concerning foreign nations, were given with reference to the state of the Jews, and with an especial regard to their advantage.—'Babylon was 'a type or figure of Antichrist, the great oppressor of God's 'church in after times. Rev. xvii. 5. And whoever 'carefully considers several particulars in this and the next 'chapter, and compares them with the former part of the 'twenty-first chapter, with chapter forty-seven, and with 'the fiftieth and fifty-first chapters of Jeremiah, which treat

'of the same subject, will easily find that these prophecies
'have an aspect beyond the taking of Babylon by Cyrus;
'in as much as the prophets describe this judgment as a 'decisive stroke, that should thoroughly vindicate the cause
'of oppressed truth and innocence; and put a final period
'to idolatry, and to all the miseries and oppressions of 'God's people.' Lowth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—5. The Lord, by his prophet, addressed himself to the rulers of the Medes and Persians, as if present, commanding them, by every means to collect forces, and to go and take possession of Babylon, and of the stately palaces of her nobles. He called them, "his sanctified ones:"
'those whom I have appointed and set apart for that ser'vice.' Lowth. (Notes, xlv. 25—28. xlv. 1—6.) He had selected them and endued them with power to execute his indignation; and he knew, that they would rejoice in doing those things, by which his name would eventually be magnified. (Note, Ezra i. 1—4.) When the Lord should thus "muster the host for the battle," immense multitudes from nations remote from Babylon, and from each other, would speedily be collected, with tumultuous noise as "the weapons of his indignation" to destroy the whole kingdom of the Babylonians. (Notes, x. 5, 6. 15.)— This exactly accords to the account given by historians of the various nations, which constituted the army of Cyrus.
(Note, Jer. li. 27.) 'The expressions are noble, and con'tain a lively description of that terror, which the appear'ance of an hostile army strikes into beholders.' Lowth.

The prophets, under various figures, taken from the sun, moon, and stars, describe the subversion of governments, when kings, nobles, and rulers are degraded or destroyed; and that confusion, horror, and dismay which attend these violent convulsions. (Notes, Jer. iv. 19—27. Ez. xxxii. 7, 8. Joel iii. 9—17. Matt. xxiv. 29—31. Rev. vi. 12—17.) The grandeur of the images, and the sublimity of the language, in these chapters, have greatly excited the admiration of the most competent judges.

V. 11. Marg. Ref.—Notes, xiv. 3—6. 12—15.—The world.] The Babylonish empire, at one time the largest in the universe, was, it seems, called "the world;" as the Roman empire was in after ages. (Notes, Dan. ii. 37, 38. Luke ii. 1.)

V. 13—15. The empire of Babylon, with all its rulers and nobles, would be as entirely subverted by the power and anger of JEHOVAH, as if the heavens and the earth were shaken out of their place; the vanquished armies or the Chaldeans would be pursued as a hunted roe, and scattered like "sheep which have no shepherd:" (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 17 :) their allies, if able, would flee in dismay to their several cities and countries; every one who was overtaken would be slain without mercy; and all who united to make a stand would be speedily cut to pieces: that is, all the associates of Babylon should share her fate. (Notes, xlvii. 12—15. Jer. l. 16. li. 7—9. Hag. ii. 6—9. Rev. xviii. 4—10.)

V. 17. Thirst of glory and dominion, and fierce revenge, would render the Medes regardless of riches; so that they would refuse to give quarter, or to spare the lives of the vanquished, for the sake of ransom. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1.) Xenophon makes Cyrus open a speech to his army in this manner, 'Ye Medes, and others who now 'hear me, I well know, that ye have not accompanied me 'in this expedition, with a view of acquiring wealth.' (Marg. Ref.—Note, Prov. vi. 27—35.)

The Medes.] 'A nation of no account when Isaiah 'uttered this prophecy: their country being a province 'under the king of Assyria, (2 Kings xvii. 6,) and not 'erected into a distinct kingdom, till ... about the seven-teenth year of Hezekiah. If the Persian bows were of metal,' (Job xx. 24. Ps. xviii. 34,) 'we may easily conceive that with a 'metalline bow of three cubits length, and proportionably strong, the soldiers might dash and slay the young 'men, the weaker and unresisting part of the inhabitants, ' (for they are joined with the fruit of the womb and the 'children,) in the general carnage on taking the city.' Bp. Lowth.—This cruelty does not seem to have been exercised, when Cyrus took Babylon: but the prophecy then began to be fulfilled; and all the several particulars were accomplished in the subsequent desolations. (Notes, 19—22. Jer. i. 16. li. 61—64, v. 64. Dan. v. 30, 31.)

V. 19—22. The vast extent of Babylon, its stupendous walls and gates, and its magnificent buildings and decorations, are celebrated by ancient writers above those of any other city in the world: 'and it was rising to its 'height of glory, while the prophet Isaiah was repeatedly 'denouncing its utter destruction.' 'From the first of 'Hezekiah to the first of Nebuchadnezzar, under whom 'it was brought to the highest degree of strength and 'splendour, are about twenty years.' Bp. Lowth. But after it was taken by Cyrus it began to decline, and soon ceased to be the seat of empire; then its population decreased; at length it was utterly deserted; and the desolate buildings were long the resort of every species of wild beasts and venomous reptiles, so that it was dangerous for travellers to approach them: at length, it was so entirely wasted, that no remains of it could be found; and, strange to tell, it cannot at present be exactly ascertained where this once renowned city stood! As the walls and buildings were formed of brick, probably, not very skilfully prepared; this might conduce to the utter decay of its ruins: but when God is pleased to destroy, nothing can withstand his power. (Notes, xiv. 20—23. xxxiv. 8—17. Jer. li. 58—64. Rev. xviii. 21—24.)—'It is uncertain what 'creatures are meant by several of these Hebrew words; '... particularly what the word searim signifies, which we 'render satyrs. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The threatenings of scripture press with incumbent weight upon the head of the wicked, and are a 'sore burden too heavy for them to bear:' and at the appointed time, they will sink the most flourishing cities and nations into ruin, as well as the souls of sinners into eternal misery.

But the believer sees this tremendous vengeance ready to fall on those, who are not aware of their own danger; and, whilst he would affectionately warn them to escape from it, he becomes the object of their derision or indignation.—The Lord selects and sets apart the weapons of his wrath, who are of themselves disposed to the work in which he purposes to employ them; and while they rejoice in gratifying their selfish passions, they unintentionally perform his righteous judgments. He invests them with power, affords them favourable opportunities, gives them helpers, and endues them with intrepidity; and thus "the LORD of hosts mustereth the hosts of the battle:" with furious tumult they march from the ends of the earth, to assault their enemies, and they are not aware that they are only "the weapons of his indignation." He also gives them success: and when his day of taking vengeance arrives, the most valiant warriors become feeble, numerous armies melt away, and all resistance is heartless and useless.—But the compass of nature cannot furnish images fully to illustrate the horror and dismay, the amazement and despair, which will come upon the wicked, when the day of the LORD, which is near at hand, "shall come, as a destruction from "the Almighty." Then indeed "all hands shall be faint," and the hearts of sinners shall melt: they shall look with astonishment one at another, and their ghastly countenances shall correspond with their inward anguish. For that day will indeed be "terrible with wrath and fierce "anger, to lay the earth desolate, and to destroy the sinners thereof out of it:" then "the stars shall not give "their light, and the sun and the moon shall be extinguished: the LORD will then punish the world for their "evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and cause the "arrogancy of the proud to cease:" nay, "the heavens "and the earth shall pass away, and no place be found for "them." (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 5—13. Rev. xx. 11—15.) In that day all these emphatical expressions, which are here used as bold metaphors, shall be found too feeble to express the least part of the tremendous scene: nor will there be any place for the sinner to flee unto, or any method by which he may attempt an escape. Alas! few act, as if they believed these things; and numbers treat the plain declarations of scripture to this effect, with at least as much neglect and contempt, or contradiction, as we can suppose the proud monarchs and nobles of Babylon did these predictions of poor Jewish prophets. But too late those monarchs and nobles found the truth of the despised oracles of God: then, neither their riches could bribe, nor the misery of the women and children soften, nor the beauty and glory of their city allure, nor its strength resist, "the weapons of the LORD's righteous indignation;" and Babylon became, at length, entirely desolated, even as Sodom and Gomorrah. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24, 25. Deut. xxix. 21—25.) Thus will the denunciations of God's word be executed on all impenitent sinners, in their full meaning: and, notwithstanding the clamours and blasphemies of his enemies, the Lord will appear glorious in justice, in their tremendous ruin; and too late they will know "whose words will stand, His, or their's." The fate of this proud city is a demonstration of the truth of the Bible; an emblem of the approaching ruin of the New Testament-Babylon; a warning to sinners to flee from the wrath to come; and an encouragement to believers to expect victory over every enemy of their souls, and of the church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1, 2. The ruin of Babylon was immediately connected with the mercy of God to the Jews; and the victories of Cyrus made way for their restoration from captivity. The terms, "Jacob and Israel," must imply, that mercy was intended to some at least of all the twelve tribes.—Probably, several proselytes were made to the Jewish religion, when they were restored to their own land: and by contributions, the inhabitants of the countries, in which they had been captives, aided their return, and so "brought them to their place." (Notes, Ezra i. vii. 11—28.) But we do not read, that the Jews ever ruled over the Chaldeans, or had any number of them for servants. It may therefore be inferred, that still more important events were predicted: and, in general all the prophecies, relating to the destruction of Babylon, have, no doubt, a typical reference to the destruction of Rome and

A chorus of Jews is introduced, expressing their ... astonishment at the sudden downfall of Babylon, and the great reverse of fortune which had befallen the tyrant, who ... had oppressed his own, and harassed the neighbouring kingdoms.' Bp. Lowth.—Babylon may be called "the golden city," with reference to her immense riches: or "the exactress of gold," (marg.) from the rapacity of her kings. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. li. 7. V. 7, 8. At the destruction of this victorious and oppressive monarchy, the whole earth seemed to experience a sudden and unexpected relief, as restored to serenity and security; and to express its joy by songs of triumph. The fir-trees and cedars mean the princes of the earth, who had seen many of their number levelled by the king of Babylon, and had trembled for themselves; but now rejoiced at his destruction, and at the peace and security thus afforded them. V. 9—11. The scene here changes. The regions of the dead are laid open to the imagination, and their inhabitants are seen in commotion, at the approach of this proud monarch to join their company: and the mighty kings and captains, (especially they whom the kings of Babylon had destroyed,) are represented as leaving their several thrones in order to meet him: not to condole with him, or to welcome him; but to insult over him as now become like one of them; and as bereft of all his pomp, luxury, musick, and mirth; while his poor remains on earth are become company and food for the worms. 'This ' is one of the boldest prosopopœias that ever was attempted ' in poetry; and is executed with astonishing brevity and ' perspicuity, and with that peculiar force, which in a great ' subject naturally results from both.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, Ez. xxxii. 18—32. Mark ix. 43—50.) Doubtless this is a poetical description, and the imagery is taken from external objects: but we must remember, that it has truth for its basis; that the wicked remove at death to a place of misery; and that proud malignant spirits do insult and torment each other. (Note and P. O. Luke xvi. 27—31.)—'The Hebrew word sheol, which our translation renders "hell," or "the grave," signifies the state of the dead in ' general, Job iii. 14; and is indifferently applied to the ' good and bad. Here it is taken in the worst sense, ' and denotes the infernal mansions of deceased tyrants.' Lowth. (Notes, Ps. xvi. 8—11. Prov. xv. 24.)—The word (שְׁאוֹל) rendered the dead, signifies giants; and Mr. Mede seems to think that the rebels of the old world, who perished in the deluge, were especially intended.

V. 12—15. The Jews seem here to resume the discourse, and address the king of Babylon, by the title of "Lucifer, son of the morning." He had been as "the " morning-star," the first in dignity among the princes of the earth; but he was now fallen from heaven and utterly debased. This language may refer to the fall of Satan and his angels, as the king of Babylon greatly resembled that arch-apostate in his character and fate. (Notes, Luke x. 17—20. Rev. xii. 7—12.) The Jews, exulting in his astonishing fall, upbraid him with his vain ambition and enmity against God. He "had said in his heart, that he " would ascend into heaven, and exalt his throne above " the stars of God:" he would eclipse all earthly princes, and even rival the God of heaven: nay, he would fix his throne on mount Zion, where God had appointed to meet his worshippers, (Note, Ps. xlviii. 2, 3;) and there receive the adoration of his subjects and vanquished foes: for he would aspire to divine honours, and "ascend above the " heights of the clouds, and be like the Most High.' (Notes, Gen. iii. 4, 5. 2 Kings xix. 25. Jer. li. 52, 53, v. 53. Ez. xxviii. 2—19. xxix. 2—5. Dan. viii. 9—12. Acts xii. 20—23.) But in fact his soul was about to sink into hell, and his body to be thrown into the pit, without even the accustomed rites of burial.—'The fall of the apostate angels is not directly recorded in the Old Testament: but ' it is implied in the distinction the holy writers make between good and evil spirits; and is sometimes alluded to ' by the prophets, when they threaten destruction to proud ' and insolent tyrants, who, in imitation of the pride of ' the devil, exalt themselves against God and his truth; ' and are the instruments of Satan in promoting idolatry ' and wickedness in the world. ... These expressions, as ' they allude to the rebellion of Satan, who affected to be ' equal with God; so they contain an exact description of ' Antichrist, who is represented by St. Paul, as "exalting " himself above all that is called God," ... as "sitting in " the temple of God and shewing himself that he is God." ' Lowth. (Notes, Dan. xi. 36. 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4.)—Brought down to hell. (15) Matt. xi. 20—24, v. 23.

known him in his prosperity: and they express their surprise and contempt, by the subsequent interrogations. Among other cruelties they mention as a reason of the dire judgments inflicted on him, his severity to his captives, whom he kept in bondage and in prison without mercy. (Notes, xlvii. 6. xlix. 24—26. li. 21—23. Jer. i. 33.)—Belshazzar performed no exploits answerable to the lofty terms here used; and we may thence infer, that the race of kings, which terminated in him, is also meant; for this is common in prophecy. ‘Belshazzar ... being slain in a sudden revolution, his body might probably be neglected for some time, and suffered to lie above ground; and afterwards be buried without any solemnity, but thrown into a pit in the very clothes in which he was slain, as common soldiers are buried in the field after an engagement.’ Lowth.—Other kings had been buried according to their dignity, and lay quietly in their tombs: but he was deprived of burial, as an abominable branch from a detested stock; as the polluted raiment of those slain in battle, when, not being worth preserving, it is tumbled into the hole with their dead bodies; or as a carcase, that is trampled under foot in contempt. His cruelty to his people, beyond the example of his predecessors, merited this treatment; and neither such evil-doers, nor their posterity, would be exempted from infamy and misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21—23. God himself here speaks, and commands the complete extirpation of the royal family of Babylon; that they might no more arise to possess the earth, and build cities to perpetuate their memory as they had done. For he would destroy both that family and their name, and Babylon also, from off the earth; yea, he would “sweep it with the besom of destruction:” (Note, 2 Kings xxi. 13:) an expression incomparably emphatical; and yet it has been fulfilled in the most extraordinary manner!—The word rendered “nephew,” properly signifies grandson. Belshazzar was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar: and after his death, it may well be supposed, that the posterity of that great conqueror was extirpated. And when Cyrus had taken Babylon, the waters of the Euphrates were not properly reduced to their channel; so that they gradually changed the adjacent country into a marsh, or fen, full of pools of water, and a habitation for bitterns or other creatures which choose such situations: the import of the original word is not certainly known. (Notes, xliii. 19—22. xxxiv. 9—15. Jer. li. 25. 61—64.)—‘I believe it may with truth be affirmed, that there is no poem of its kind, excellent in any language, in which the subject is so well laid out, and so happily conducted, with such a richness of invention, with such variety of images, persons, and distinct actions, with such rapidity and ease of transition, in so small a compass, as in this ode of Isaiah. For beauty of disposition, strength of colouring, greatness of sentiment, brevity, perspicuity, and force of expression, it stands among all the monuments of antiquity unrivalled.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 24—27. These verses are by many considered, as referring to the event of Sennacherib’s invasion, (which might be considered as a pledge for the performance of the foregoing prophecy:) yet they are introduced, and concluded, in so energetick a manner, “The LORD of hosts hath sworn, &c.” “The LORD of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it?” (Notes, xlvii. 5—11. Ex. xvii. 15, 16. Eph. i. 9—12. iii. 9—12;) that they seem rather to be the continuance and conclusion of “The Burden of Babylon.” Assyria was a part of the dominions governed by the king of Babylon: (Note, Ezra vi. 22:) and the ruler of the same countries may be intended. But no king of Babylon was ever broken in the land of Israel. It is therefore highly probable, that some future events, respecting the New Testament-Babylon are intended, and the restoration of Israel as connected with it; (Note, 1, 2;) when this conclusion of the prophecy shall receive a literal accomplishment. I do not profess to decide how far some modern conjectural expositions are, or are not, well grounded: (Note, xi. 11—16:) but, while the interpreta-

V. 28—32. These verses form a distinct prophecy, which probably was delivered at another time.—Uzziah had vanquished the Philistines: (2 Chr. xxvi. 6, 7 :) but when he died, and the Jews were afterwards greatly enfeebled during the reign of Ahaz, and left in great difficulties at his death; the whole land of Philistia, and all connected with it, rejoiced. But it was predicted, that Hezekiah would be more terrible to them than Uzziah had been; as if a serpent of a less poisonous nature, and less formidable, should produce a cockatrice, or a fiery flying serpent. (Note, 2 Kings xviii. 8.) At the time predicted, the very poorest of the Jews would be sustained in plenty, and live in safety; whilst the Lord would destroy the root of the Philistines' prosperity by famine, and employ Hezekiah to slay their remnant. Instead of rejoicing therefore, howling would be more seasonable for Philistia; for the whole land would be ruined: a smoke, or cloud of dust, from the north would give notice of the approach of the army of Judah from the north-east to waste them; from which none would desert, when the appointed season arrived. And if any nation should send ambassadors to make peace with the Jews, or to enquire concerning their deliverances; (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 12, 13. 2 Chr. xxxii. 30—33, v. 31;) they might answer, that 'JEHOVAH himself had chosen and established Zion, as the place of his special presence and worship; in order that his people, when afflicted and distressed, might betake themselves thither for refuge; and be safe and secure under his protection, though poor and destitute in themselves.'—"The first born of the poor" (30) 'denotes those who are remarkably such; as "the first-born of death" (Job xviii. 13) signifies some unusual disease, and such as is distinguished from the common ways of dying.' Lowth. "The poor shall feed upon my choice first-fruits." Bp. Lowth. The choice "first-fruits," however, were not allowed to be eaten by any except the priests. (Num. xviii. 8—13. Notes, Ex. xxii. 29—31, v. 29. Lev. xxiii. 10—14, vv. 10, 11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23.

JEHOVAH's plan of governing the world is in all respects arranged for the good of his chosen people: so that even revolutions in kingdoms conduce to the true interests of his church. His judgments on some ungodly men are made instrumental to the conversion of others, who join themselves to his people, and cleave to them: and the consolations of his service abundantly compensate their losses and sufferings. Israel will certainly obtain a complete ascendancy over all opposers, with "rest from sorrow, and fear, and hard bondage;" whilst all their oppressors will be reduced to the most abject slavery and contempt. The Lord now glorifies his patience in bearing with his rebellious creatures; but he will shortly glorify his power and justice in their punishment: and men shall behold with astonishment the sudden and tremendous ruin of oppressive rulers, and cities full of the gains of iniquity.—There always have been men, who gloried in using power, to gratify their rage, ambition, and cruelty. But when they are crushed by others more powerful and successful than themselves, their ruin excites a general rejoicing. Speedily the most mighty and terrible of the scourges of mankind will be broken; and having here resembled in disposition the inhabitants of hell, they will there be made like them in impotency and misery: and their only distinction will then be, a degree of wrath proportioned to their many and great, but abused talents, their enormous crimes, and extensive mischievousness; whilst their mutual revilings and taunts will enhance their misery. What then will all their present pomp and sensual mirth avail them?—The more boundless the ambition, and the higher the exaltation, of the wicked have been; the more tremendous will be their downfall. As our first parents ruined themselves by aspiring to be as gods; so the same propensity has infected their posterity; and many arrogant mortals have defied God, and claimed divine adoration: as if it were not sufficient to be exalted above all earthly potentates; and as if they really thought, that they could "ascend into heaven" and be like the Most High!" But the more of this inebriating poison they gorge, the greater is their resemblance to Satan, and the more their fall into hell will accord to the fall of that "Lucifer, the son of the morning." For a while they weaken the nations, make the earth to tremble, shake kingdoms, and change the world into a wilderness, a slaughter-house, or a dungeon for the few whom they suffer yet to live. But soon death weakens and removes them; and whilst their souls are in torment, perhaps great honour is rendered to their breathless remains. (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—26.) But sometimes the Lord disgraces the remains of such monsters of iniquity; and the contempt shewn to those who once were renowned on earth, causes such “as narrowly observe them” to say, “Is this the man, who—!” But whether honourably interred, or left as a carcase trodden under feet, such men are abominable and contemptible, and entail misery and disgrace on their posterity, for whom “slaughter is prepared for the iniquity of their fathers.”—When God arises against the wicked, he will so crush them, that they shall rise up no more; and he will sweep them from the earth “with the besom of destruction:” and deserts, seas, and pools of water, in the places, where once proud cities stood, form affecting monuments of the power of his wrath, and demonstrations of the truth of his word.

V. 24—32.

According to the thoughts and purposes of God every event must take place; for who can disannul his purpose, or turn back his out-stretched arm? Woe then be to those, against whom “he swears in his wrath, that they shall not enter into his rest!” (Notes, Heb. iii. 7—19. iv. i, 2.) When one instrument of his vengeance is removed, he soon raises up another more terrible: and he easily destroys the root, as well as lops off the branches, of his enemies, who have always cause to weep and howl, instead of rejoicing. (Notes, Luke vi. 24—26. James iv. 7—10. v. 1—6.) But the Lord has founded Zion, for a refuge to poor sinners, who “flee from the wrath to come,” and trust in his mercy through Jesus Christ. None, that humbly by faith apply for admission into this “city of our God,” are excluded. There they are protected and provided for, even the poorest and most guilty of them: and he has not only ensured their salvation by his promise, but confirmed it with an oath; that they might enjoy “a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before them.” (Note, Heb. vi. 13—20.) Let us then glory in our privileges, and in our relation to the crucified Immanuel: let us always be ready to give “a reason of our hope” to every enquirer: and let us inform all around us of our comforts and security, and exhort them to seek the same Refuge and Salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1. (Notes, Jer. xlviii.) ‘This and the following chapter, taken together, make one entire prophecy. ... The time of the delivery, and consequently of the completion of it, which was to be in three years from that time, is uncertain; the former not being marked in the prophecy itself, nor the latter recorded in history. But the most probable account is, that it was delivered soon after the foregoing, in the first year of Hezekiah, and that it was accomplished in his fourth year, when Shalmaneser invaded the kingdom of Israel.’ Bp. Lowth.—“Surely Ar was destroyed and brought to silence in a night, &c.” Old Version. That is, suddenly, in a very short time and not after a long siege; and with every circumstance and aggravation of terror. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)—Kir of Moab.] ‘There are two cities called by the name of Kir in Scripture: this here mentioned belonged to Moab; the other a city in Media, 2 Kings xvi. 9. Am. i. 5.’ Lowth.

V. 2. Either the king of Moab is here introduced, or the people are spoken of collectively, in the person of their progenitor, who is represented as mourning over his ruined posterity. ‘Bajith and Dibon’ may perhaps mean an Idol-temple at Dibon, to which the people resorted with their lamentations and devotions, in their terror and distress. (Josh. xiii. 17.) Little is known concerning the places here mentioned. (Marg. Ref.)—The speedy performance of the prediction would confirm the credit of Isaiah, as a prophet, and tend to excite the attention of his contemporaries to his prophecies concerning them.

V. 3, 4. (Marg. Ref.) When the Moabites went up to the flat roofs of their houses, perhaps to perform some idolatrous worship, or to discover the motions of their enemies, or to look out for succours; all they saw and observed would send them down howling and weeping, as in despair.—Armed, &c. (4) ‘Even the soldiers shall lose their courage, and cry out like women!’ Lowth.—‘Even the men of war, which should by their courage cheer up others, shall in despair of success cry and lament: and their life shall be but a grief and burden to them; for they are in a sad expectation of death.’ Bp. Hall.

V. 5. ‘This seems to be spoken in the person of the Moabites. (xvi. 7. xxi. 3. Jer. xlviii. 31. 36.) ... If we understand the prophet, as speaking in his own person, it beasts of prey infested the desolate countries, and devoured the remnant of the inhabitants.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst wicked men are asleep, or drunken, in the night, their enemies are watchful and active; and death often breaks their pleasing or golden dreams, or silences their tumultuous revels. But let us "be sober and vigilant," lest "that day should come upon us unawares."—The ungodly, when in danger or trouble, may well be alarmed and inconsolable; for they are destitute of a comforter, and of any adequate support. Yet, alas! they are but seldom induced to approach the mercy-seat of God, with penitent sorrow and believing prayer; and all other endeavours to extricate themselves eventually involve them the more.—Temporal sufferings may render life grievous to such as find the thoughts of death intolerable; but some, alas very many in these days, are left to seek escape from present anguish, by plunging themselves into eternal misery! How worthless then are men's idolized treasures!
How soon will every possession be torn from them, or made a burden to them! and more and more anguish still remains for impenitent sinners, after all which they have suffered, till they fall into that place where is "weeping ritance with the redeemed of the Lord, in that kingdom which cannot be moved.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The Moabites had paid tribute to the kings of David's race, out of their flocks; but when Judah was reduced, they revolted: (2 Kings iii. 4. 1 Chr. xviii. 2. Note, 2 Kings i. 1;) and the prophet seems here to call on them to send again the tributary lamb, to Hezekiah, from one end of the land to the other, and "to the "daughter of Zion," the place of God's worship; as a token of their submission to him, and their desire of deprecating his indignation, by furnishing sacrifices at the Temple. For otherwise the invaders would desolate the land, and drive the daughters of Moab before them, destitute and defenceless, to pass the fords of Arnon, like birds that wander from their nest. (Marg. Ref.—Note.
Prov. xxvii. 8.)

V. 3—5. The Moabites were exhorted, as they were in interest concerned, to take counsel how to escape the judgments which impended over them: and if they would be advised by the prophet, let them begin by doing justice, and protecting the oppressed. Many of the Jews had been driven from their habitations, during the distractions of the preceding years: let Moab shelter those of them who came into their country, as the people of God, and conceal them from their spoilers. For, though Israel had been grievously wasted, they would not always continue in that distressed condition. Their ravagers were about to be cut off: God would in mercy establish Hezekiah on the throne, and in the tabernacle of David, as one who would tread in the steps of his pious progenitor; maintaining the truth and worship of God, impartially executing justice, seeking diligently to find out the right in every cause, and making haste to reform the nation, and promote righteousness:

the outcasts, bewray not him that wandereth.

4 Let ¹ mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler: ^k for the ^{*} extortioner is at an end, the spoiler ceaseth: the [†] oppressors are consumed out of the land.

5 And ¹ in mercy shall the throne be [‡] established: and he shall sit upon it in truth, ^m in the tabernacle of David, ⁿ judging, and seeking judgment, and ^o hasting righteousness.

6 ¶ We ^p have heard of the pride of Moab; he is very proud: even of his haughtiness, and his pride, and his wrath: ^q but his lies shall not be so.

7 Therefore ^r shall Moab howl for Moab, every one shall howl; for the foundations of ^s Kir-hareseth shall ye ^t mourn; surely they are stricken.

8 For ^u the fields of Heshbon languish, and ^v the vine of Sibmah: ^x the lords of the heathen have broken down the principal plants thereof, they are come even unto ^y Jazer, they wandered through the wilderness; her branches are ¹ stretched out, they are gone over ^z the sea. Or, plucked up.

9 Therefore ^a I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer, the vine of Sibmah: I will water thee with my tears, ^a O Heshbon, and Elealeh; ^b for ^{*} the shouting for thy summer-fruits, and for thy harvest, is fallen.

10 And ^c gladness is taken away, and joy out of the plentiful field; and in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting: the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses; I have made their vintage-shouting to cease.

11 Wherefore ^d my bowels shall sound like an harp for Moab, and mine inward parts for ^e Kir-hareseth.

12 And it shall come to pass, ^f when it is seen that Moab is weary on the high place, that ^g he shall come to the sanctuary to pray, ^h but he shall not prevail.

13 This is the word that the LORD hath spoken concerning Moab ⁱ since that time.

14 But now the LORD hath spoken, and then they would again prosper. (Notes, Am. i. 11, 12. Ob. 10—14.)—Bishop Lowth applies the counsel of the prophet to the Jews, and supposes that he exhorted them to entertain the Moabitish outcasts. But though this doubtless was a proper conduct for them; yet it is far more likely, that the exhortations were addressed to the same persons, against whom the predictions were uttered.—Some think that the counsel given to Moab was ironical. In the days of Ahaz, and especially after the victory of Pekah over Judah, the Jews, in great distress, perhaps sought shelter among the Moabites: but the Moabites are supposed to have repelled and betrayed them. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5—11.) Had they at that time acted according to the reasonable advice here given, they might have escaped the ruin which now awaited them; but, by their cruelty to the people of God, they had provoked his vengeance: Pekah, Remaliah, and other oppressors had been cut off; (Notes, vii. 1—9. 16;) Ahaz, the wicked king of Judah, was dead; and Judah no longer needed the assistance of Moab; for Hezekiah's throne was established in mercy.—‘He shall govern his people with an equal mixture of justice and mercy; and therein prefigure the Messiah, in whom all the promises made to the house of David shall be finally accomplished. “The tabernacle of David,” may allude to his having been a shepherd, and dwelling in tents, before he was advanced to the kingdom; but both here, and in Amos ix. 11, (the only places where the phrase is used,) it mystically denotes the ‘church.’ ... (Comp. Lev. xxvi. 11, with Rev. xxi. 3.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Am. ix. 11, 12. Acts xv. 13—18.)

V. 6. The excessive pride of the Moabites, and their indignation against God's people, were generally reported, and well known: but their deceitful designs would not prosper.—Some explain the last clause thus: “His wrath is greater than his strength.” His power is not equal to his vain boastings. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. xlviii. 29, 30. Zeph. ii. 8—10.)

V. 7—11. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xv. 2.) The vines of Sibmah seem to have been had in great repute, and to have been thence propagated in very distant regions: but the lords, or conquerors, of the nations would soon destroy them, with all other productions of the land: and then their shouting and singing, for the vintage or harvest, would utterly cease. The prospect of these calamities greatly affected the prophet; he could not refrain from weeping, and his inward commotion was such, that he compared it to the tremulous sound of a harp. (Marg. Ref.—Jer. xlviii. 31—33. Note, xv. 5.) “Whose generous shoots overpowered the mighty lords of the nations.” ... הָלֹמִי, ‘knocked down, demolished; that is, overpowered, intoxicated. The drunkards of Ephraim are called by the prophet, xxviii. 1, הָלֹמִי יִין.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 12. The king and the nobles of Moab, in terror and distress, would weary themselves in sacrificing upon one high place after another; (Notes, Num. xxiii. 13. 27;) and would at length resort to the sanctuary, the chief temple of their god Chemosh: but this would avail nothing to their preservation. (Notes, 2 Kings iii. 26, 27.)

V. 13, 14. The Lord had made the approaching ruin of Moab known to his prophets, in former times; (Notes, saying, Within ^kthree years, as the years of an hireling, and ^lthe glory of Moab shall be contemned, with all that great multitude; ^mand the remnant shall be very small and ^{*}feeble.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most awful denunciations of divine wrath are connected with the discovery of a way of escape, to those who take warning.—Submission and tribute are due to such as God has made rulers of the land; and it is a valuable privilege to obey those who govern according to his word.—From one end of the earth to the other, there is no salvation for sinners, but by submitting to "the Son of David," and devoting themselves and their substance to him; and they who refuse this, will be reduced to extreme misery, without regard to rank or sex. It behoves all therefore to "take counsel:" to renounce their sins, to "do justice, "to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God:" these are the genuine fruits of "faith which worketh by love;" and all who love Christ will be kind to his poor people, and use their influence to provide for them and protect them in distress. Extortioners and oppressors may for a time be permitted to afflict them, but they will witness the destruction of every enemy: and such, as will not countenance them in their suffering, shall not share their felicity.—The Redeemer's throne is established in mercy and in righteousness; his subjects, who share his mercy, rely on his truth, and obey his just commands, are "a holy "nation;" and those rulers, who copy his example may expect to prosper.—The pride and enmity of men's hearts commonly render them deaf to the most pressing exhortations to repentance, submission, and the obedience of faith. And many, especially the powerful, affluent, wise, and learned of the world, are very proud, and prone to be exasperated by the counsel of Christ by his faithful ministers; (Notes, Prov. i. 24—31. Rev. iii. 17—19;) and to prefer to it their own lying, unprofitable devices. If the Lord have taught us to value what such men despise, let us be thankful: and let us not envy or covet their transient enjoyments; for we may foresee a season, when they will terminate in weeping and howling. If "that mind be in us, "which was in Christ," our bowels of compassion will be moved for them; we shall weep in the prospect of those miseries, which are coming upon our most indignant enemies; and we shall persist in our endeavours to do them good, "if peradventure God may give them repentance."

hold, ^cDamascus is taken away from ^dbeing a city, and it shall be ^ea ruinous heap.

2 The cities of ^fAroer are forsaken: 'they shall be for flocks, which shall lie down, and ^gnone shall make them afraid.

3 The ^hfortress also shall cease from Ephraim, and the kingdom from Damascus, and the remnant of Syria: ⁱthey shall be as the glory of the children of Israel, saith the LORD of hosts.

(Notes, Luke xix. 41—44. 2 Tim. ii. 23—26.) But numbers, when driven by distress to their devotions, weary themselves to no purpose; whilst every one goes to his sanctuary to pray; but neglects the mercy-seat, and the great High Priest of Israel, or only pays a hypocritical regard to them. When the Lord has spoken, and his appointed time arrives; all the glory and prosperity and multitude of the wicked shall be contemned and perish: for "who "can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Notes, xiv. 24—27. Dan. iv. 34—37.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1. This prophecy must have been delivered at the time, when the kings of Syria and Israel confederated against Judah. (Notes, vii. 1—9. 16.) It is called "the burden of Damascus," as foretelling the desolations of that city; but it was at least equally directed against the kingdom of Israel. 'It was delivered probably 'soon after the prophecies of the seventh and eighth 'chapters, in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz; and was 'fulfilled by Tiglath-pileser's taking Damascus, and carrying the people captives to Kir, (2 Kings xvi. 9,) and 'over-running great part of the kingdom of Israel, and 'carrying a great number of the Israelites also captives to 'Assyria: and still more fully in regard to Israel, by the 'conquest of the kingdom, and the captivity of the people, effected a few years after by Shalmaneser.' Bp. Lowth.—Damascus was afterwards rebuilt; and, after many changes, continues to this day. It was for a season "taken away from being a city, and made a ruinous heap;" but it was not "swept with the besom of destruction." (xiv. 23. Notes, Jer. xlix. 23—27. Am. i. 3—5. Zech. ix. 1.)

V. 2. Aroer.] Aroer was a city on the river Arnon, formerly belonging to Moab: (Marg. Ref. e.—Note, Jer. xlviii. 19—25:) but it might at this time be in the hands of the Syrians. It is, however, far more probable, that there was a district of Syria of the same name, in which several cities were placed. Such coincidences in names are common in all parts of the world.

V. 3. As Syria and Israel had combined, in attempting the ruin of Judah, and of the house of David, they should be visited with similar judgments. (Note, 1.)—Samaria, the fortress of Israel, would be destroyed, and the kingdom cease from Damascus: nor would the remnant of Syria, which survived the taking of Damascus, any more be established as a kingdom; but, losing all their glory, they would decline like the Israelites, as mingled among other nations, and subject to foreign princes. Accordingly, Syria was first subject to the Assyrians; and successively to the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans, and others, even to this day, when it belongs to the Ottoman empire:—so exactly has this prophecy been accomplished!

V. 4—8. The glory and prosperity of the kingdom of Israel would more and more decline, like a man in a consumption: and their enemies would waste them, as the husbandman reaps the harvest, and as the gleaner after him collects the scattered ears. Yet a few individuals would be preserved: as a few grapes or olive-berries are, when the rest are gathered; being situated out of the gatherer's reach. (Rev. xix. 9, 10. Deut. xxiv. 19—21.) These would renounce idolatry, and return to the worship and service of the Lord, looking to him for help, and having respect to his commandments, as the Holy One of Israel; and not to the altars erected to their idols, the work of their own hands. (Marg. Ref. —Note, ii. 6—9.)—After the ravages of Tiglath-pilezer, several of the Israelites joined themselves to the Jews in celebrating the passover, and in destroying idolatry. (Notes, ? Chr. xxx. xxxi.) Afterwards many were incorporated with the Jews, (especially after the Babylonish captivity,) and finally renounced all gross idolatry. “The altars dedicated to the work of his hands:” ... “that is, the altars of their idols.” Bp. Lowth.

V. 9. This obscure verse probably means, that the cities of Israel would be as entirely desolated, as those of the Canaanites had been in the conquest of the land by Joshua. The Septuagint render it, ‘Thy cities shall be forsaken; as ‘when the Hivites and Amorites forsook,’ (that is, their cities,) ‘because of the children of Israel; and they ‘shall be desert.’ Either this is a mere paraphrase and exposition, or the text from which it was translated differed from that of the present Hebrew Bible.

V. 10, 11. ‘The pleasant plants and shoots, from a foreign soil, are allegorical expressions for strange and idolatrous worship; vicious and abominable practices connected with it; reliance on human aid, and on alliances entered into with the neighbouring nations,...to all which the Israelites were greatly addicted, and their expectations from which should be grievously disappointed.’ Bp. Lowth.—The Israelites bestowed indeed much pains about such plants; but when they expected an harvest from them, it proved a ruinous heap: and instead of rejoicing, in possessing the prosperity which they were thus seeking, they had intense grief and desperate sorrow as their reward. ‘Because thou hast forsaken the true God, to follow idols, nothing shall thrive with thee; although, like an industrious gardener, thou procurest the choicest plants, and takest the greatest care to make them grow; ... yet, when thou expectest to reap the fruit of thy labours, (so our margin very fitly translates Jom nachalah “the day of inheritance,”...) thou shalt find nothing but loss and disappointment.’ Lowth.—“In the morning, when thou shalt have made thy shoots to spring forth, even in the day of possession, shall the harvest be taken away, and there shall be sorrow without hope.” Bp. Lowth. Bp. Horsley and Mr. Faber think, that the prophet was here led forward to foretel the state of Jacob, or the whole house of Israel, in their present dispersions; in which they do not in general worship idols: yet they have “not respect to the God of Salvation,” and are remarkably depressed and disappointed in all their endeavours. (Note, Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 12—14. These verses seem to form a detached subject, and describe with great energy the march and ruin of Sennacherib's army. A woe is denounced against his numerous forces collected from many nations; or a summons is given to them. Their noise, and blasphemous rage, and impetuous force, resembled the mighty waters of the sea: but when He, (that is, "the God of Israel,") should rebuke them, they would flee like the chaff, or thistle-down, before the whirlwind. (Marg.) In the evening Jerusalem would be in consternation and distress, because of the powerful invader: but before morning almost his whole army would be cut off, and he would flee with the remnant as fast as possible. (Notes, x. 28-34. 2 Kings xix.)—Bishop Horsley and Mr. Faber suppose, that a future vehement, but unsuccessful, assault of Antichrist against the Jews and Israelites, when converted to Christ, and restored to their own land, is here predicted. (Note, Dan. xi. 44, 45.) The event must determine how far this opinion is well grounded.

the noise of the seas; and to the rushing of nations, that make a rushing like the rushing of *mighty waters!

13 The nations shall rush like the rushing of many waters: ^b but God shall ^c rebuke them, and they shall flee far off, and ^d shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like [†] a rolling thing before the whirlwind.

14 And behold ^e at evening-tide trouble; and before the morning he is not. This is ^f the portion of them that spoil us, and the lot of them that rob us.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished:" and if the people of God associate with his avowed enemies, they must expect to share in their heavy judgments. His powerful wrath speedily desolates flourishing cities, and wastes all human glory, as a man's vigour, comeliness, and cheerfulness decline by an incurable disease: and when sinners are ripe for destruction, the Lord will employ some of his instruments to reap and glean them, till he make a full end of them. But though no impenitent sinner can escape the wrath of God; yet in the worst state of the visible Church, or any part of it, he has always reserved to himself a few humble believers: these he will place out of the reach of the instruments of his vengeance. (Note, Rom. xi. 1-6.) Publick calamities likewise are often the means of bringing men to renounce their idols and iniquities, to look to the Lord for help, and to have respect to his promises and precepts.—If professed Israelites "forget the God of their salvation," and are not mindful of the Rock of their strength;" they will seek help, peace, and prosperity in vain from every quarter; their labour will be lost, and their "harvest" "a heap, in the day of grief and desperate sorrow." But happy are they who remember God as their Salvation, and rely on his power and grace: their enemies may rage, and rush upon them with dreadful force and fury; but God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee away, "as a rolling

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. This is generally allowed to be to us one of the most obscure prophecies in scripture; though perhaps well understood by those to whom it was delivered. "The land shadowing with wings," seems to mark out Egypt as connected with Ethiopia; and it may be so called on account of the ridges of mountains which shadowed it on each side: or rather, because the Egyptians pretended to shadow the Jews under their protection, as "with wings," against the incursions of the Assyrians. "Ho! to the land of the winged cymbal." The Egyptian sistrum is expressed by a periphrasis; the Hebrews had no name for it in their language. ... The cymbal they had; an instrument in its use and sound not much unlike the sistrum; and to distinguish from it the sistrum, they called it the cymbal with wings. ... If these words are rightly interpreted, ... Egypt must be the country to which the prophecy is addressed.' Bp. Lowth. The shape of the Egyptian cymbal is alluded to, which had projections not unlike wings. The land was "beyond," or which borders on, "the rivers of Cush." The river Nile, flowing through Ethiopia and Egypt, is divided into seven streams, or rivers, before it reaches the sea.—The word translated "Woe," may be merely a call on them to attend to the message of JEHOVAH.

V. 2. The land intended was remarkable for sending ambassadors, or messengers, upon the seas and rivers, in vessels of bulrushes, or formed of the papyrus; and this was peculiar to the Egyptians, who made vessels of that plant for this purpose. Ex ipso quidem papyro navigia texunt. Pliny. To this country "swift messengers" were ordered to be sent: that is, the message of the Lord ought assiduously to be conveyed into every part of it; for to them it appertained. The nation is described as "scattered and peeled;" or, as it may be rendered, "stretched out and smoothed:" and this may refer to the length of the land of Egypt from north to south, being a vale on each side of the Nile above seven hundred miles long; Ethiopia extends to a considerable length on the south of out and trodden down, whose land the rivers * have spoiled.

^g ⁱ ^h ³ ^g All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, ^h see ye, when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.

ⁱ ⁴ For so the LORD said unto me, ⁱ I will take my rest, and I will [†] consider in my dwelling-place ^k like a clear heat [‡] upon herbs, and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest.

it; and the whole was smoothed, or made level by the constant inundations of the Nile. It was also “a nation terrible from their beginning hitherto,” which is characteristic of Egypt: “a nation meted out, and trodden down;” alluding to the frequent admeasurement of their lands, which was rendered necessary by the inundations of the river, by which their land-marks were destroyed; and to their method of throwing the seed upon the mud, when the waters subsided, and treading it in, by turning their cattle into the fields. “Whose land the rivers have spoiled,” or nourished, as some think the original word may mean; and indeed it is so anomalous, that we can only conjecture from what root it is derived.

V. 3. It is here supposed, that this prophecy was published before, but related to, that time, when Sennacherib had routed the army of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, and was preparing to besiege Jerusalem; (Note, 2 Kings xix. 9;) intending afterwards to prosecute his advantage against Egypt and Ethiopia. But the Lord seems to have called on them, and all the inhabitants of the earth to attend; and when they saw this proud victor lift up his ensign on the mountains, and heard him blow the trumpet for the assault of Jerusalem, to expect the extraordinary interposition of God in behalf of his people. ‘I... suppose, that the prophecy was delivered before Sennacherib’s return from his Egyptian expedition, ... and that it was designed to give to the Jews, and perhaps likewise to the Egyptians, an intimation of God’s counsels in regard to the destruction of their great and powerful enemy. ... I take God to be the Agent in this verse; and that by the Standard and the Trumpet, are meant the meteors, the thunder, the lightning, the storm, earthquake, and tempest, by which Sennacherib’s army should be destroyed, or by which at least the destruction shall be accompanied. ... xxix. 6. xxx. 30. 31. x. 16, 17.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 4—6. God had assured his prophet, that he would rest securely in Zion, contemning the assault of the invaders: and he would shew his regard to his dwelling place and worshippers, “like a clear heat after rain, or like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest;” that is, as their protection and consolation in their extreme distress. For whilst the enemy deemed his schemes maturing, as the harvest or vintage; and before the perfect bud and opening flower were ripened into the sour grape, before the critical season of executing his design was arrived; the Lord would cut off all the branches of his vineyard; and his army, and the carcasses of his numerous host would be a plentiful provision for the wild beasts and birds of prey, during a very long time. (Notes, Ez. xxxii. 2—6. xxxix. 1—6. Rev. xix. 17—21.)

V. 7. (Note, 2.) The nation before described, hearing of this surprising catastrophe, would send oblations to be offered at the temple of the Lord of hosts upon mount Zion, giving glory to his name. (2 Chr. xxxii. 23.) This and similar passages were doubtless intimations, at least, of the conversion of the nations to the God of Israel. The Egyptians would be delivered from the Assyrians, by the power of the God of the Jews; and not the Jews by their assistance: and the doom of the proud tyrant Sennacherib, was intended as a warning to them, to renounce their idols and iniquities.—An entirely new interpretation has been given to this obscure chapter, by Bp. Horsley, and Mr. Faber; who suppose future events to be intended, concerning the destruction of Antichrist, and the restoration of the Jews, as converted to Christ, to their own land, by some protestant Christian nation, of great maritime power and influence, meaning Great Britain.—I must refer the reader to ‘Bp. Horsley’s Letters on Prophecy,’ and ‘Mr. Faber’s View of the Prophecies concerning Judah and Israel:’ being by no means satisfied with the interpretation; and yet wholly averse and incompetent to decide against it. (Note, xi. 11—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should endeavour to call the attention of mankind to the works of God for his people: for wherever they live, or however they are distinguished, whether they have been prosperous and terrible, or obscure and trampled upon, they are greatly concerned in them: and the warnings of his providence, as well as the oracles of his word, are intended for their conviction.—When the arrogant opposers of the truths and servants of Christ lift up the standard and blow the trumpet of war, and openly assault the church, with full confidence of success; let the inhabitants of the earth attend, and wait for the event. The Lord, undisturbed by their puny efforts, will still delight in Zion, and protect his dwelling place; nor shall the policy or power of hell prevail against his church, as built on this Rock, that “Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God.” (Note, Matt. xvi. 18.) He will protect and comfort his people, in all their persecutions and tribulations, and render their souls most flourishing in holiness, when their afflictions most abound. But he will blast the ripening schemes of his presumptuous foes, when they deem their success certain; and their subsequent contempt and misery will be proportioned to their present haughtiness and arrogance. Thus shall the nations of the earth be convinced that JEHOVAH is God, and Israel his people, and shall concur in presenting their spiritual sacrifices to his glory. And happy are they, who take warning by his judgments on others, and make haste to join themselves to him and to his people.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. This chapter seems to contain a general prediction of the several calamities, which would come upon Egypt, from the invasion of that country by Sennacherib, to the times of its subjugation by the Macedonian kings, the successors of Alexander the Great; terminating with prophecies of spiritual blessings at length to be conferred on many of the inhabitants.—When the Lord by “the weapons of his indignation,” should come into Egypt with terrible majesty, as “riding on a swift cloud.” (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, Deut. xxxiii. 26,) their idols would not be able to afford them any protection; nay, they would become the derision and contempt of the victors: and even the evil spirits, which were worshipped through the lifeless images, would be filled with consternation; while the courage of their worshippers would melt, as wax before the fire. (Marg. Ref.—Ex. xii. 12.—Notes, Jer. xliii. 8—13. xlv. 29, 30. xlv. Ez. xxix.—xxxii. Zech. xiv. 16—19.)

V. 2, 3. Not many years after the destruction of Sennacherib’s army, the affairs of Egypt were reduced to the utmost confusion and anarchy, by fierce and bloody intestine contentions and civil wars in every part of the land:

these ended, after some time, in the tyranny of twelve princes, who divided the country among them; till at length Psammitichus overcame all the rest, and possessed the sole dominion for fifty-four years. Some other dreadful civil contests, which took place in Egypt, and conducted to its subjection under foreign conquerors, may also be predicted: but in all these difficulties, both the courage and conduct of the people failed; and their magicians could afford them no more help than their idols did. (Notes, 11—14. xlvii. 12—15. Ex. vii. 11, 12.)—That have familiar spirits. (3) חֲזָקִים. Note, Num. xxi. 10.

V. 4. Not long after the death of Psammitichus, Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt; and he and his successors, and afterwards the Persian kings, ruled over that country, with despotick sway and most grievous and cruel oppression, till the days of Alexander the Great. The word rendered “a lord,” may more properly be translated lords: and be interpreted of all the usurpers, conquerors, and oppressors, who successively tyrannized over Egypt. But some consider Cambyzes, the son of Cyrus, and Ochus, or Darius Nothus, “as the cruel lord and fierce king,” particularly intended, ‘who are both branded in history, for cruel tyrants and monsters of men.’ Bp. Newton. The old translation renders it, “a mighty king.” Indeed the word admits of that meaning; and then Alexander, the powerful deliverer of Egypt from the oppression of the Persian kings, under whom and his successors, the Egyptians were greatly favoured, may be pointed out, “I will shut up the Egyptians in the hands of severe lords; and a mighty king shall rule over them.” (Note, Ez. xxix. 14, 15.)—Will I give over, &c.] “I will give up Egypt bound into the hands of cruel lords, and a fierce king shall rule over them.” Bp. Lowth.—“Shut up.” Marg. (Notes, Ps. xxxi. 7, 8. Rom. xi. 25—32, v. 32. Gal. iii. 19—22, v. 22. 23—25, v. 23.)

V. 5—10. (Marg. Ref.) The inundations of the Nile failing, the communication of the interior parts of the country with other nations, by the sea, would be cut off; the remaining waters would become putrid; the brooks, which were the fences of the fields, or of the cities, would dry up: even the papyrus, and other aquatick plants which were a considerable article in the commerce of the Egyptians, would wither; the corn sown by the brooks, as well as the productions of the higher grounds, would be destroyed; and their gainful fisheries and manufactures would be ruined, for want of materials or purchasers. (15. Notes, Ex. vii. 21. Ez. xxx. 12.) This may be understood literally of a dreadful famine; or figuratively, of the decay of their prosperity, and the drying up of all the sources of their wealth, through their civil distractions. The Septuagint render the last clause, ‘All they who ^a make barley-wine shall mourn and be grieved in soul.’ (10) The Egyptians had few vines; and the use of fermented liquor from barley, or other grain, was very general among them.

V. 11—14. The Egyptians pretended to an antiquity far beyond any of the neighbouring nations; and their kings (of whom Pharaoh was the common name,) were descended, as they boasted, from a royal race which had continued for some thousands of years. This was altogether fabulous: but doubtless Egypt was renowned for wisdom and science, before any other nation, at least in the countries of which the records are much known. (Note, Ps. cv. 22.) Yet now their princes and counsellors, who should have been the stay, or “pillars,” of the land, and of all its tribes, were become foolish and brutish: and whilst they flattered their king, as the son of wise, as well as ancient kings; they seduced him into very foolish measures: or, while they boasted of the wisdom and dignity of their own ancestors, they could neither foresee nor prevent the calamities, which God had purposed to bring upon them. If there were any possessed of this wisdom, where were they to be found?—Indeed the Lord would give them up to their own perverse schemes, and to quarrel with each other, as their private interests or humours led them; till

13 The ^{*} princes of Zoan are become fools, the princes of ^a Noph are deceived; they have also seduced Egypt, even they that are [†] the stay of the tribes thereof.

the land would be reduced, by their fierce and bloody contests, to the condition of a drunken man, who can scarcely stagger along, and is equally the object of contempt and pity. (*Marg. V. 16. ‘When God intends the destruction of any people, he commonly takes from them their strength and courage; so that “a thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one.” ... (xxx. 17. Deut. xxviii. 25. Jer. i. 37. Nah. iii. 13.) This is what the heathen expressed by a panick terror: but Isaiah more properly calls it here, “the shaking of the hand of the LORD of hosts:” God’s holding his rod over a people, and still threatening them with severer judgments.’ Lowth. (*Marg. “cities,” preceded his march into Egypt: and it is probable, that the rumour of the ravages and cruelties, committed in Judah, excited great consternation among the Egyptians. (Notes, xx. 1. 2 Kings xviii. 13. xix. 9—13.) In like manner the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the surviving Jews, preceded the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar; and would be heard of with very great alarm by the distressed inhabitants. (Notes, Jer. xliii. 8—13. Ez. xxix. 17—20.)

V. 18. The preceding prophecy includes a series of years, reaching at least to the time of Alexander the Great, and the favour shewn to the Egyptians by him and his successors: (Note, 1:) and some think, that their subsequent servitude to the Romans, Saracens, and Turks, to this present day, is also predicted. But, in the mean time, some of them would become acquainted with the true God, learn the language of Canaan, and “swear to the LORD of hosts:” i. e. they would learn to speak of God and his word and worship, as the Jews did, and to vow obedience to him: or to use his name, and to call him to witness in their solemn oaths, as his worshippers. (Notes, xlv. 23—25. Jer. xii. 14—17, v. 16.) It is not known what five cities were intended; and especially, there is considerable uncertainty respecting that, which would be “called the city of destruction:” though it is commonly supposed to mean Heliopolis, or “the city of the sun; and it is thought that it should be thus read. (Marg.) Several cities, however, would be thus favoured, especially one, which had been notorious for idolatry, or was apparently ripe for destruction.—Under the Macedonian kings, who succeeded Alexander and reigned in Egypt, peculiar privileges were granted to the Jews, and numbers of them settled in that country; where they professed their religion, and worshipped God in the synagogues which they built. In process of time the scriptures were translated into Greek, which was then understood by numbers in Egypt; and this translation is now called the Septuagint. Thus the natives gradually became acquainted with God, and his truth and will; and probably many were proselyted to the Jewish religion. A temple was also built by Onias, at Heliopolis, where a worship was performed, similar to that at the temple in Jerusalem: and though this was irregular, and could by no means be justified, yet it might be over-ruled to draw the attention of the Egyptians to the true religion.

(Notes, Acts i. 4—8. viii. 5—8.) But though these events might be, in some degree, an accomplishment of the prophecy before us: yet it seems more immediately to relate to the planting and flourishing of Christianity in Egypt, in the primitive ages.—“Learned men observe from this place, ‘where the Jews’ language is called the language of Canaan, ‘that the Hebrew is the same with the old Phenician language.’ Lowth. (Note, Gen. xi. 6—9.)

V. 19—22. ‘It is a judicious observation of Calvin upon Ivi. 7. ... The prophets, when they speak of the Gentiles ‘coming into the church, express their serving the true God, by such acts of devotion as were most in use in ‘their own time, and therefore could be best understood ‘by those to whom they directed their discourses. ... ‘Onias indeed in after times built an altar and temple in ‘Egypt for the use of the Jews, thinking to fulfil this prophecy literally; but it was against the general sense of ‘his own nation, who thought that according to their laws ‘no temple ought to be built but in Jerusalem. ... From ‘whence it appears, that they thought this prophecy was ‘to have a mystical, and not a literal completion.’ Lowth. (Note, Ex. xl. 2.)—These verses seem typically to describe the effects which followed when the Egyptians were converted to Christianity; and not merely the proselyting of some of them previously to the worship of the true God. The altar may denote the atonement of Christ, and access to God through him; (Notes, Heb. xiii. 9—16;) and the pillar, either their avowal of the Lord, as the Object of their worship, or his acknowledging of them as his people; and his ordinances, among them, would be a sign and a witness of their relation to him. (Marg. Ref. o.) Their crying unto the Lord, and his sending them a Saviour and a great One, to deliver them from their oppressors, can be interpreted of their deliverance by Alexander the Great from the Persian yoke, only in a very subordinate sense, if at all: indeed there is little reason to conclude, that in his days there were many Egyptians, who sought deliverance from God by earnest prayers. Christ himself and his spiritual redemption no doubt were principally intended: and probably some future grand deliverance from oppressors, to whom the Egyptians are or shall be exposed, is specially predicted. (Notes, xi. 11—16. Dan. xi. 40—45. Zech. x. 5—12.) The Lord, however, promised to make himself known unto them, and that they should acknowledge him, and worship him, and pay their vows to him: for his smiting of them would make way for their conversion, prayers, and healing in answer to them. (Note, Hos. vi. 1—3.)

V. 23—25. For many ages, the Assyrians, (or the Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians, who successively had dominion in the same regions,) were engaged in hostilities with the Egyptians; and they strongly fortified their countries against each other: (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxv. 20—24. Dan. xi. 1—30. Zech. ix. 8:) but it is here predicted, that there would be an unobstructed and well prepared way, or road, made between the two countries, to favour the intercourse of the inhabitants with each other, and with Israel, as situated directly in this frequented road: that they would also unite together, and with Israel, in serving and worshipping the LORD; and that Israel would prove a blessing between the two nations, by communicating to them the knowledge of God, and his salvation. (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. Zech. viii. 20—23.) Nay, the Lord himself would pronounce them blessed, and shew favour to them, as his people and the work of his hands, new created unto holiness, even as he had been used to do to Israel his inheritance. “The work of my hands,”... is always used in this prophet, of those who are in covenant ‘with God, and members of his church.’ Lowth. (Notes, xxix. 22—24. xlv. 11. lx. 15—22. Ps. c. 3. cxlix. 2. Eph. ii. 19—22. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)—I apprehend that the grand accomplishment of these verses, and of the latter part of this extraordinary prophecy, is still to be expected. At the same time, I would observe, that to explain the whole chapter, as predicting one grand event, supposed to be foretold in very many scriptures; so as to exclude the evident literal accomplishment of the former part of the chapter; is calculated to weaken the evidence, from prophecies already fulfilled, to the divine inspiration of the scripture, to confound the minds of plain readers, and to furnish cavils to those, who say, there is no certainty in prophecy.—It is of immense importance to draw the line as exactly as possible, between what has been fulfilled, and what has not.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—17.

When ungodly men escape one threatening danger, they think themselves secure: but “evil pursueth sinners,” and will speedily overtake them: and when the Lord comes to execute judgment, every false confidence will fail, and every sinner’s heart will melt within him. To punish a guilty nation, the inhabitants need only to be left to themselves, and they will soon be set against one another, “every one against his brother, or his neighbour; city against city,” and province against province. Thus the righteous Lord weakens offending nations, and destroys their counsel; and their foolish expedients for deliverance, involve them in still deeper guilt and misery. When collective bodies are thus divided among themselves, and either struggling to acquire or retain dominion, or aiming to preserve or recover their liberties, without regard to God, he often gives them into the hands of some foreign power, which rules over them “as a cruel lord, and a fierce king;” so that the true friends of civil liberty, and all who would be considered as reformers, should begin by seeking the favour of God, and liberty from the bondage of sin. He can soon cut off those sources of national wealth, which are looked upon as most certain: and whilst kings and nobles are forming and executing their infatuated projects, to aggrandize themselves; the poor are often deprived of employment and subsistence, and so hurried on by designing men into turbulent and ruinous measures. Indeed the comfort of the lower orders in society is seldom, if ever, duly regarded by ambitious men: yet, where this is neglected, the counsel of the wisest is brutish, and tends to deceive, whilst it flatters those who depend upon it: and thus they become the ruin, who should be the stay, of the tribes of the land. But he leaves rulers to be actuated by a perverse spirit, and to bring publick affairs to the utmost confusion and contempt, in order to punish the lower orders also for their transgressions: and every view of this subject proves, that “righteousness exalteth a nation, but that “sin is the reproach of any people:” (Note, Prov. xiv. 34:) and that invasions, civil wars, and the decay of trade, and the want of employment, or even food for the poor, are calls from God to national repentance and reformation. When he “shaketh his hand,” and shews tokens of indignation; the most courageous become as women; and he renders sinners afraid of those, whom before they despised or oppressed. “The counsel of the LORD of hosts, “which he hath determined” against all the workers of iniquity, will make them a terror to themselves and to each other; and every surrounding object a terror to them.

V. 18—23.

The severest temporal judgments of God combine with his designs of mercy: and revolutions in mighty kingdoms make way for the success of his gospel. Already numbers have learned to “speak the language of Canaan, and to “swear to the LORD of hosts;” to erect altars to his name, and to offer him spiritual sacrifices, in those places which were the most addicted to idolatry: and every event of this kind is a proof of the divine original of that blessed book, in which so many prophecies to this effect are contained, which are fulfilling from age to age in the view of the whole world.—The Lord has indeed sent a Saviour and a great One, to deliver those, who were oppressed by Satan; all that cry unto him for that redemption, are made partakers of it; and ere long he will open a way for his gospel into the remotest nations of the earth. Then hostile nations shall amicably accord in serving him; and commerce shall become, in a most eminent degree, the means of religious intercourse, and ‘the communion of saints,’ in regions most remote from each other. For they shall then alike know, trust, and worship “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;” he will acknowledge them as “his people, the work of his hands,” and “his chosen inheritance:” and it shall then be known, that Israel, which has been so despised and hated on earth, was indeed blessed of God, and a blessing in the midst of every land.—But, what a change does the grace of God effect upon men’s dispositions, conversation, and behaviour! Believing his truth and attending on his ordinances, they learn to speak a new language, sincere, pure, pious, heavenly, and instructive: (Note, Zeph. iii. 9, 10 :) they become just, harmless, kind, and peaceable; and they live in harmony and do good, and aim to be a blessing to their neighbours, and even to their enemies. (Note, xi. 6—9. P. O. 1—9.)—Finally, let the broken-hearted and afflicted, who call on God for his mercy, take courage; for he will be intreated, and heal their souls, and turn their sorrowing supplications into joyful praises.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. Tartan was one of Sennacherib’s captains, who seems here to be called Sargon. (2 Kings xviii. 17.) Tartan was sent by him to form the siege of Ashdod, a very strong city in Philistia, (Marg. Ref. b,) which is recorded to have afterwards held out against a king of Egypt for twenty-nine years. Tirhakah, against whom Sennacherib marched, was king of Cush: whether Cush meant Ethiopia south of Egypt in Africa, or a part of Arabia in Asia. (2 Kings xix. 9.) The inhabitants of Ashdod expected help from the Egyptians and Ethiopians; and many of the Jews did the same; but the prophet was ordered to predict Sennacherib’s victory over those confederated nations.—Some think that Ashdod was at this time in the hands of Hezekiah.

fore them bare-foot and uncovered, save with a short garment, which scarcely sufficed to hide their nakedness; the prophet therefore, was ordered to walk abroad in the same manner. As a mourner for the sins and miseries of his people, and as denouncing judgments on them, and as mortified to the world, he was used, it seems, to wear sackcloth constantly: (Notes, 2 Kings i. 8. Zech. xiii. 2, 3 Matt. iii. 4. Rev. xi. 3—6 :) but on this occasion, he was to lay even that aside, and to appear exactly as the captives were exposed. This would subject him to ridicule and reproach, and be uneasy both to his body and mind: yet he promptly obeyed. It is not probable, that he continued to appear in this manner for three years: but rather it was a sign of what would take place after three years; and the wonder excited by seeing the prophet walking publicly in this manner, would render his prediction the more noticed. If he once walked out thus, it might answer this end; but it is most likely he continued to do so for three days. (Notes, Jer. xlii. 1—11. Ez. iv.)—Sennacherib is computed to have been absent above three years, from the time that he first laid Hezekiah under contributions, till he came back with the design of besieging Jerusalem. During this time he gained many advantages over the Egyptians: and just before his return, he obtained a complete victory over Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, when, it is probable, this prediction was literally fulfilled. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 13. xix. 9—13.)

may be called to endure hardship, reproach, and contempt, for the Lord's sake. We ought not indeed to do any thing of our own minds, which may appear absurd or ridiculous: but the world will often deem us foolish or mad, when we are singular in obedience to God: (Note, 2 Kings ix. 11 :) and we must at all times refuse conformity to its vain fashions, and be mortified to its pleasures.—The attire and demeanour of ministers should be such, as may best give emphasis to their message, and call men's attention to them as the servants of God: and in order to be a sign and an example to others, we must be such men as the world wonders at.—True faith will produce implicit obedience: and the minister cannot reasonably expect that his hearers should regard his doctrine, unless he demonstrate his own belief of it by his practice.—The Lord will effectually support his servants under the most painful and mortifying effects of their obedience: and what we are called to suffer for his sake, is commonly very trivial or transient, compared with what numbers groan under from year to year, through the cruelty of conquerors, or lordly oppressors, who hold them in bondage.—All men's expectations from creatures, and glorying in them, will end in terror and shame: those who flee for succour to such deceitful refuges, will often be reduced to despair; and if the people of God have recourse to these carnal confidences, they will infallibly tend to discourage their hope and comfort: but they, who trust in the Lord, shall never finally be confounded.

It became habitable by being drained by the many canals that were made in it.' Bp. Lowth.—The whirlwinds in the south of Arabia often come with destructive fury: (Marg. Ref.—Zech. ix. 14. Note, Jer. iv. 11—13:) thus ruin would irresistibly come upon Babylon from Media and Persia, the armies of which were very terrible; and through the deserts, which intervened between those countries and Babylon.—'The prophet renews his threatenings against Babylon, as he does afterwards, (xlvii.) to convince the Jews, by this repetition, of the certainty of the event; ... and thereby support them under their captivity, when that should come.' Lowth.

V. 2. The grievous calamities coming on Babylon, were revealed in vision to the prophet. 'The words may be thus translated ... "A grievous vision: there is made known to me an oppressor of the oppressor, and spoiler for the spoiler:" that is, It is now come to the king of Babylon's turn, to feel that oppression and ravage himself, which he had before brought on others.' Lowth.—"The plunderer is plundered, and the destroyer is destroyed." Bp. Lowth. No change of the text is needful, for this rendering; but merely a trifling one of the vowel points. (Notes, xiv. 1—6. xxxiii. 1. Jer. xxv. 8—26. li. 20—25.) For the Lord had called Elam, or Persia, and Media, to go up and besiege Babylon; and thus to terminate the sighing of the captive Jews, and many others, who had been grievously oppressed by Babylon.

V. 3—5. Almost two hundred years before the time, the prophet here seems to personate Belshazzar, on the night when Babylon was taken, and he was slain. (Notes, Dan. v.) We are introduced, as it were, into the banqueting room of that prince, and witness his astonishment: he declares to us his dismay and anguish, when he saw the hand which wrote, and the writing, on the wall; and how he was bowed down, when Daniel read and explained it to him; how "his heart panted, and fearfulness affrighted him;" and the night, which he had set apart for peculiar pleasure, was thus turned into terror and dismay. For whilst he had given orders to prepare the feast and to set the watch, and whilst he and his princes ate and drank; Cyrus had commanded his captains, to burnish their arms, and prepare for the assault: or, Belshazzar's princes were loudly called to arms, from their riotous feasting.

V. 6—9. The prophet here speaks in his own person. The Lord commanded him to set a watchman, who was required to make observations, and give notice of them: and he informed the prophet, that “he saw a chariot, with “a couple of horsemen, &c.” This may mean the chariots of war, and the united cavalry of the Medes and Persians; and the chariot of asses, and that of camels, may mean the carriages loaded with their baggage, drawn by these animals. It, however, described the march of Cyrus’s army, furnished with every thing requisite for forming the siege of Babylon. Having “hearkened diligently “with much heed,” he further cried, “a lion:” that is, the destroyers of Babylon march forward with boldness and fury, as a lion in quest of his prey: or, according to the margin, “He cried as a lion,” that is, very vehemently. (Marg.)—“The particle as is frequently understood.” Lowth. Though the watchman had been used to watch whole days and nights, he had never before observed such things: for the chariots and horsemen arrived at once; and instantaneously it was proclaimed, with energetick repetition, that Babylon, with all her graven images, was destroyed, and thrown to the ground. All this seems to have passed before the prophet’s mind in vision: and was descriptive of his own office and duty, as a prophet and watchman to the house of Israel. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, lvi. 9—12. Ez. iii. 17—19. xxxiii. 2—9.) This rapid succession of events does not accord to the warning given by the king of Babylon’s watchmen, nor indeed to any thing which could really exist; for it comprises the transactions of many years: nay, it is probable that the ruin of the New Testament Babylon was also intended to be predicted. (Notes, xiii. 19—22. Jer. l. 2, 3. li. 7—9. 61—64. Rev. xiv. 8. xviii. 1—3. 21—24.)

V. 11, 12. This is a distinct, brief, obscure, and almost enigmatical, prophecy. Dumah is Idumea, or the land of the Edomites, mount Seir. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Some one of that nation called to the prophet, in vision, as the watchman who waked when others slept, to enquire, what time of the night it was, or what was the news of the night. This may either mean an earnest enquiry of the Edomites concerning the fate of their own country; or perhaps an insulting enquiry, concerning the duration of the afflictions of the Jews, in the Babylonish captivity. (Notes, Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9. Ez. xxv. 8—14. xxxv. Joel iii. 18—21. Am. i. 6—8. 11, 12. Ob. 10—19.) To this the watchman answered, “The morning cometh, and also the night:” which may signify, that the deliverance of the Jews would come in its appointed time; but after a short continuance of approaching prosperity to the Edomites, a dreadful ruin would come on them, of which the prophet saw no end. ‘The Edomites, as well as the Jews, were subdued by the ‘Babylonians. They enquire of the prophet, how long ‘their subjection is to last: he intimates, that the Jews ‘should be delivered from their captivity; not so the ‘Edomites.’ Bp. Lowth. (Notes, xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Mal. i. 2—5.) But ‘if ye will enquire indeed, ‘and ask questions in earnest; enquire of God first, ask ‘his mercy, and afterward come again, and ye shall have ‘a more favourable answer.’ Lowth.

V. 13—17. (Notes, Jer. xlix. 28—33.) This is a short prophecy concerning calamities, which were coming on the Arabians. (Marg. Ref. f, g, h.) The travelling companies of the Dedanim, a tribe of the Arabians, would shelter themselves in the forests from their hostile invaders: and let other tribes, who were not molested, meet them with provisions, that they might not perish: (it may be translated as a command: Marg.) for indeed they fled from the most imminent danger of death. These desolations were to take place in an exact year from the publishing of this prophecy; and probably it was accomplished by Sennacherib, when he first marched his army into Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The history of mankind is little more than a detail of the treachery, rapine, and cruelty, which they have committed, and of the miseries which they have endured: and an insight into futurity would be attended with many grievous discoveries, respecting ourselves, our families, and those with whom we should sympathize. But, “sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.”—What anguish and horror must seize the enemies of God, when he shall arise to execute vengeance upon them; and when all which they see, hear, remember, or expect, shall combine to increase their terror! This some perceive to be their wretched case, at the approach of death; and all the ungodly will know it in another world. But words can never express, nor can imagination reach to an adequate conception of their dismay or despair. And what numbers will then dolefully exclaim, “The night of my pleasure hath he turned into ‘fear unto me!’”—While sinners are saying, “Let us ‘eat, drink, and be merry;’” and let others watch for our souls, if they see good; perhaps the Lord is about to say, “Thou fool, this night is thy soul required of thee.”—He has set ministers, as watchmen, to declare what they see: let every one, therefore, to whom this office is committed, “hearken diligently, with much heed,” to his instructions, and continue day and night upon his watchtower; and give sinners warning of their approaching danger; that at least he may deliver his own soul. (P. O. Ez. xxxiii. 1—9.) Let him “declare the whole counsel “of God,” as far as he can learn it, whether it relate to mercies, or judgments: and let all, who love their souls, attend to the warnings of such ministers, as may truly say, “that which I have heard of the LORD, ... have I declared “unto you.” (Notes, Acts xx. 18—31. 1 Cor. xv. 1, 2.) For all the enemies of God will as surely be destroyed, as Babylon and her graven images are fallen: but every trial conduces to purify believers, that they may be gathered as wheat into the garner.—There are many, who make curious enquiries of the watchmen; they would willingly have many difficult questions resolved, unrevealed mysteries explained, and abstruse prophecies interpreted; and they want to know exactly where we now are in the series of predicted events: but they do not enquire into the state of their own souls; or about the way of salvation, or the path of duty, or how to grow in grace. These are mere Edomitish enquirers: and though we should be ready, as far as we can, to answer any proper question; yet we ought to warn such men “to look to themselves,” and to repent, and return to God by faith and prayer, and not amuse themselves with these discussions. Whilst they forget their time of life, and are growing old in their sins; it little concerns them to enquire, what time of the night it is with the church: for though the morning of her deliverance comes, yet the midnight of their final misery approaches with equal speed.—Calamities still go round, in this sinful world: and it behoves us to relieve the distresses of our brethren, knowing that our turn may come shortly. But happy are they, and they only, whose riches and glory are placed out of the reach of hostile invaders: all other prosperity will speedily pass away; “for the “LORD God of Israel hath spoken it.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Jerusalem, as situated in the midst of surrounding hills, and favoured with the revealed truth and will of God, is here called “The valley of vision.”—The prophet saw, in vision, all the inhabitants of that city gone up to the roofs of their houses, on a sudden alarm, and to make observations; and he enquired what was the matter. Their houses in general were without windows towards the street, and the tops flat, and much used, on various occasions. (Notes, Deut. xxii. 8. Matt. x. 27, 28.) ‘The houses in the east were in ancient times, as they are ‘still generally, built in one and the same uniform manner. ‘...The house is built with a court within, into which ‘chiefly the windows open: those that open to the street ‘are so obstructed with lattice work, that no one either ‘without or within can see through them.—Whenever ‘therefore any thing is to be seen or heard in the streets, ‘any publick spectacle, any alarm of a publick nature; ‘every one immediately goes up to the house-top to satisfy his curiosity. ...The people running all to the tops ‘of their houses gives a lively image of a sudden general ‘alarm.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 2, 3. Jerusalem had been full of the hurry and tumult of business and pleasure, and at certain seasons, of the multitudes who attended the sacred feasts: but now the stir and tumult was of another nature. Being invested

(Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 1—7. Ez. xii. 1—16.)

V. 4. ‘He showeth what is the duty of the godly, and especially of the ministers, when God’s plagues hang over the church.’ (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. vi. 24—26. ix. 1, 2. xiii. 15—17. Luke xix. 41—44.)

V. 5. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings xix. 3. xxv. 8—10. —Of crying, &c.] One crying to another to flee to the adjacent mountains, in order to escape destruction.

V. 6, 7. Elam and Kir, (Marg. Ref. p—r,) or the Persians and Medes, might serve in Sennacherib’s army as subjects to Assyria. Yet the former part of the prophecy seems to accord best to the demolition of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. For it does not appear, that any destructive pestilence or famine raged in the city, when Sennacherib invaded the land; or that the rulers fled, or were taken and bound; or that the walls were broken down. (Notes, 2, 3. 5.)—By “chariots of men” we may understand those in which men rode and fought; for the word, translated chariots, sometimes means carriages employed in other uses.

V. 8—14. The preceding verses chiefly relate to subsequent events, yet they might have also some reference to previous calamities: but these seem to predict Sennacherib’s invasion, and the behaviour of the Jews on that occasion. He dismantled many of their fortified cities, which had been the covering or protection of Judah; and he threatened the siege of Jerusalem. This put Hezekiah and of the city of David, that they are many: and ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.

10 And ye have numbered the houses of Jerusalem, and the houses have ye broken down to fortify the wall.

11 Ye made also ^xa ditch between ^ythe two walls, for the water of the old pool: but ^zye have not looked unto the Maker thereof, neither had respect unto him that fashioned it long ago.

12 And in that day did the Lord God of hosts ^acall to weeping, and to mourning, and ^bto baldness, and to girding with sackcloth:

his princes upon examining the state of their armouries and fortifications; and upon making various preparations for defending the city. (Note, 2 Chr. xxxii. 3—8.) But numbers of the people had no proper regard to the Lord, who had constituted Jerusalem to be the place of his own worship, and had long before fashioned every thing respecting it, in subserviency to that end. Notwithstanding the pious labours of Hezekiah and others, most of the people were destitute of faith and piety: and instead of uniting in fasting and prayer, with every token of godly sorrow and humiliation, to which the Lord evidently called them in his providence, if not explicitly by his prophets; they were generally indulging themselves in riot and feasting, and that from the most atheistical principles: as if the apparently near approach of death urged them to seize the present fleeting moment for sensual gratification. (Notes, v. 11—17. lvi. 9—12. Neh. viii. 9—12. Am. vi. 3—8. Matt. xxiv. 36—44. 1 Cor. xv. 31—34, v. 32.) The Lord was so provoked by this profane contempt of his uplifted scourge, that he determined to accept of no expiatory sacrifices for it; but to punish it by the death of the criminals: though for his own name’s sake he would, for that time, spare the city. The same part was doubtless, for substance, acted over again at the time, when Nebuchadnezzar besieged, took, and destroyed Jerusalem.—‘There were two pools in or near Jerusalem, supplied by springs: the upper pool, or the old pool, supplied by the spring called Gihon, 2 Chr. xxxii. 30, towards the higher part of the city, near Zion, or the city of David; and the lower pool, probably supplied by Siloam.’ Bp. Lowth.—‘The ditch was a channel to carry off the waters from the upper to the lower pool.’ Lowth.—House of the forest. (8) Notes, 1 Kings vii. 2. xiv. 25—28.—Revealed, &c. (14) Marg. Ref. d.

V. 15. This prophecy concerning Shebna seems to have been delivered about the same time with the preceding: and perhaps he was one of the ringleaders in the unseasonable and profane riot, above severely reprobated. Some think that he had been preferred by Ahaz to be treasurer and steward of the household; and that he outwardly complied with Hezekiah's reformation, to keep his place, though a proud and wicked man. (Marg. Ref. g.) If this were the Shebna, of whom we read in the history of Sennacherib's invasion; the prophecy had not its full accomplishment, till some years after. Some think he was deprived of his office as treasurer, but still continued scribe, or secretary. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 2.) But perhaps another person of the same name is meant.

V. 16. It is thought that Shebna was a foreigner; that instead of being treasurer to Hezekiah, he had no right to associate with the Jews at all; and that his connexions and inclinations led him to favour their enemies. He, however, deemed himself established in authority till death; and had prepared himself a magnificent sepulchre in a lofty and conspicuous situation, according to the custom of monarchs; and durable, as if graven out of a rock, to perpetuate his memory and grandeur after his decease. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xiv. 16—20.)—"O thou, that hewest out thy sepulchre on high, that gravest in the "rock an habitation for thyself!" Bp. Lowth.

V. 17—19. Notwithstanding Shebna's ostentatious confidence, his ruin was at hand. He would be degraded from his dignity; violently forced into captivity; covered with infamy, as the condemned criminal's face was covered for execution; (Marg.—Note, Esth. vii. 8;) driven from place to place, in a strange and wide country, like a ball, when driven with great force in an open field, where no wall or fence obstructs its course: and at length he would die in misery and disgrace; whilst the remains of his magnificence would shame that family, which had preferred so ostentatious and wicked a man. Doubtless this sentence was speedily and exactly executed, though nothing is recorded concerning him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—25. God himself appointed Eliakim, his servant, to succeed Shebna; (Marg. Ref. o;) he knew that Hezekiah would be obedient to his word sent by his prophet Isaiah; and this probably occasioned Shebna's disgrace. Eliakim would succeed to the robe and girdle, which were worn by those in office: and he would fill his high station, with the prudence and affection of a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the Jews in general. The key also was a token of authority in those days, as the seals are now: being an emblem, that great and important matters were entrusted to a man's care, and at his disposal; and that he could admit to manifold privileges or advantages, or exclude from them. Probably, either a real key, or the figure of one, was worn upon the shoulder. Christ applies this part of the emblem to himself: we may therefore look upon Eliakim as, in some respects, a type of him. (Notes, Matt. xvi. 19. Rev. i. 12—20, v. 18. iii. 7.)—As nails also are fixed in the walls, on which to hang such things as may be wanted; thus Eliakim would be established in authority, and act so honourably, that his advancement would be like raising his "father's house to a "glorious throne:" and all the reputation and interest of every branch of the family would be secure in his hands; for he would be able and willing to take care of them, whether more or less considerable, whilst all those who

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

No burden will be more heavy, than that which falls on "the valley of vision," and weighs down those who lived wickedly amidst 'the means of grace.'—They who have been most secure and prosperous, and those cities which have been most full of the tumultuous hurry of business, pleasure, and ambitious contests, are liable above others to be surprised with unexpected calamities, and left without redress under them.—The Lord has many ways of destroying his enemies: so that it is as vain to attempt to escape, as to withstand, "the power of his wrath."—The servants of God, who clearly foresee, and awfully warn sinners of their approaching miseries, are most affected by the prospect. They sometimes "weep bitterly and refuse to be comforted," because of the trouble, perplexity, and ruin, which are coming on their beloved neighbours, relatives, and countrymen: yet, whilst their hearts thus melt with tender compassion, they are counted cruel and morose; because they insist upon it, that God will execute this threatened vengeance on all the impenitent, unbelieving, and ungodly, without exception.—But all the horrors of a city taken by storm, and given up to indiscriminate rapes, murder, and plunder, are scarcely a shadow of the terrors of "the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." And yet the invasion of a fertile country, when the choicest valleys are full of hostile armies, and the gates of populous cities beset with merciless besiegers, must be inexpressibly distressing to the inhabitants.—Often the approach of danger discovers that weakness which before was unnoticed; yea, and detects that hypocrisy, which had not been suspected: and then the further and the more carefully men examine, the more they discover their exposed and perilous situation. But too generally they look only to externals, and rest in a superficial amendment; without duly respecting the Creator of the world, and the Head of the church, who "fashioned" both "long ago," for his own glory, and the good of his people: nor can the most pious rulers or teachers remove the infidelity, impiety, or hypocrisy of the people; except as the Lord works by them.—It is no new thing, even in Israel, for men not to "know the signs of the times:" and when the Lord calls to repentance, fasting, and prayer; nay, when kings, as well as consternation occasioned by it, 1—14: of the restoration of Tyre's prosperity, and the conversion of the Tyrians, 15—18 ministers of religion, obey the call, and warn others to do so; numbers continue to indulge their lusts, and add to their sins, and increase the fierce wrath of God against them; as if "let us eat, and drink, for to-morrow we die," were indeed a sentiment worthy of a rational creature! And, whether this infidelity work by presumption or desperation, it produces the same contempt and defiance of God; and is a lamentable token, that a man is given up to judicial hardness of heart, and will perish in his impenitency.

V. 15—25.

The impiety and profligacy of the lower orders in society is often a vain and absurd imitation of their superiors. Too often those, who ought not to find admission into the visible church, (having "nothing there,") are at the head of her affairs: and though no human wisdom and piety can uniformly prevent this; yet generally the ostentation, ambition, and avarice of such men, are an indelible scandal to those who prefer them, and to all concerned in their advancement.—But what a vanity is all earthly grandeur, which death will so soon terminate! And what will it avail, whether we be laid in a magnificent monument, or covered with a sod! Surely the fopperies of death are the vainest of all vanities: yet those who most value them, are often deprived of them. No stability can ensure the continuance of prosperity. When the Lord is displeased, he soon drives men with violence from their places, and hurries them from one vexation, or place of banishment, to another, till they die in disgrace and misery.—But it is happy, for nations, when the removal of wicked men opens the way for the true servants of God into authority. They will act as his stewards, and as the deputies of the Son of David: and in the insignia of their dignities, they will read their duties, and thence learn righteousness, faithfulness, and goodness; and will study to be fathers to the people, especially to the remnant of true Christians in the land. When extensive authority is lodged in such hands, it will be used for the benefit of mankind: and rulers of this character are indeed a credit to their families, and will promote their interests in subserviency to the publick good: but all dependence placed on the ungodly, will soon be thrown down with them into perdition. Indeed no expectations can properly be formed of advantage, even from pious men, except as the instruments of God for our good. (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3—5.)—But the Father has lodged all authority in heaven and earth in the hands of his beloved Son, who for our sakes became also his "righteous Servant." To him he has entrusted the infinite concerns of his own glory and the honour of his law, to all eternity: and if we submit to his authority, we may confidently hang all our hopes and interests, and those of our families even to remote posterity, upon him; and in every thing rely on his wisdom, power, truth, and love. Such are great concerns to us; but they are perfectly safe in his hands. He has opened our way of access into the presence of our reconciled Father; he will set before us an open door, which no man can shut, both whilst we live, and when we die; and bring both soul and body to his eternal glory. But

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1. (Notes, Jer. xlvii. Ez. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii. Joel iii. 3—8. Am. i. 9. 10.) It is generally agreed, that this prophecy foretels the destruction of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar. The ships and mariners, by whom the commerce of Asia, Africa, and Europe in general, or of Carthage and Spain in particular, with Tyre was carried on, are called on to mourn and howl at her ruin.—'As Tyre was one of the most famous marts in the world in those times; so the destruction of it must be a great loss to all merchant-adventurers. ... Every house or warehouse in Tyre is shut up and all trade ceased.' Lowth.—'The Tyrians, when they saw no other means of escaping, fled in their ships, and took refuge in Carthage, and in the Islands of the Ionian and Egean sea; from whence the news would soon spread, and reach Tarshish.' Bp. Lowth and Jerom as quoted by him. Thus the ruin of Tyre was revealed to them, i. e. the inhabitants of Tarshish, from the Isles of Chittim, or the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. (Marg. Ref. e.)

V. 2. Silence is a mark of grief and consternation. And that entire failure of commerce, which a close and long continued siege would produce, effectually silenced the noise of the busy multitudes, which before was heard in this merchant-city.—There were two distinct cities, called old and new Tyre, the former a sea-port on the continent, the latter on an island at a small distance, and dependent upon the other. "Be silent, O ye inhabitants of the sea-coast." Bp. Lowth. The Zidonians built Tyre, which is therefore called "the daughter of Zidon" (12); and it was replenished with all its riches by the trade, which it originally derived from the mother-city: but it soon acquired a high pre-eminence above it.—Nebuchadnezzar took old Tyre after a siege of thirteen years: but the inhabitants had previously removed their most valuable effects, either to new Tyre on the Island, or to places beyond sea. (Note, Ez. xxix. 17—20.) After a time new Tyre became a very flourishing city; but it was besieged and taken by Alexander the Great. (Notes, Ez. xxvii. 26—36. Zech. ix. 1—4.)

V. 3. Sihor means the river Nile. (Marg. Ref. h.) 'It had this name from the blackness of its waters charged with the mud, which it brings down from Ethiopia, when it overflows. Et viridem Egyptum nigra fecundat arena.' (The black sand fructifies verdant Egypt.) Bp. Lowth. (פִּי, to become black.) The Tyrians traded largely with the Egyptians for the corn, which their lands, watered by the Nile, yielded in great abundance: and thus, the harvest of the river, springing from the seed sown when its great waters subsided, yielded an immense revenue to Tyre. That river also opened a communication to the Tyrians, with the interior parts of Egypt; and the rich commodities there purchased tended greatly to enrich that merchant-city.

V. 4. 'The Zidonians, when their city was taken by the king of Ascalon, betook themselves to their ships, and landed, and built Tyre.' Justin, quoted by Bp. Lowth. (Note, Josh. xix. 24—31.) Zidon therefore gloried in being the founder of Tyre, that "strength of the sea," and, as it were, sole proprietor of it: but she might now be ashamed; for her daughter complained that she was depopulated, and, instead of sending colonies to other cities, she had now no children brought forth, or growing up, to replenish herself. New Tyre, indeed, continued for many ages a flourishing city: but from the time that Alexandria in Egypt was built, her trade began to decrease, and at length Tyre was utterly desolated: and there are, at this day, no remains of that renowned city, except a few huts for fishermen.—Let us not forget that these are standing miracles to demonstrate the divine original of the sacred scriptures. (Notes, Ez. xxvi. 14. 21.)

V. 5. As the nations were alarmed at the desolations of Egypt, by the power of God, in the days of Moses; (Note, Ex. xv. 14—16;) so the report of the ruin of Tyre would fill them with consternation. Or, "As soon as the report of Tyre shall come to," or "be heard in, Egypt, they shall be in great pain for it," viz. because they exported their corn to Tyre and made a gainful trade of it (3). And this sense the Septuagint follows. Lowth.

V. 6, 7. The Tyrians gloried in the great antiquity of their city: and indeed it seems to have been a fortified city in the time of Joshua. (Josh. xix. 29. Note, 4.) Through its extraordinary wealth, it was replete with every thing conducive to festive indulgence; and the inhabitants were very jovial and luxurious. (Notes, xxii. 2, 3. 8—14.) But now they would leave home with howlings and anguish of spirit; and numbers of them would be forced to seek a habitation in distant countries, either as captives or refugees.—The Septuagint, instead of "Tarshish," read Carthage, which was a colony from Tyre.—'The prophet speaks of Tyre, as of a tender and delicate woman, not used to hardships, who yet should be forced to travel on foot tedious journeys into foreign countries, being driven from her own habitation.' Lowth. (Note, xlvii. 1—3.)

V. 8, 9. The Tyrians boasted of being able to dispose of crowns and kingdoms as they pleased; and therefore the Lord had counselled to tarnish the pride of all human glory, by ruining that renowned and haughty city, whose "merchants were princes, whose traffickers were the "honourable of the earth." (Notes, ii. 10—18.) The question proposed, as if by some observer who was filled with amazement at the surprising change, and the answer of the prophet to the question, have a peculiar energy and animation: and the attentive reader seems almost to witness, what is thus brought immediately under his notice.

V. 10. The inhabitants of Tyre, when the city was likely to be closely pressed by the Chaldeans, are counselled silently and speedily to leave the country, which had no longer any strength or defence; as a river swiftly, yet almost imperceptibly, glides through a land.—Tyre might be called "the daughter of Tarshish;" because her grandeur was greatly the effect of her trade with that city; and because of the close connexion which subsisted between the two cities, and the dependence of the Tyrians on Tarshish, after Tyre was taken.—"Pass through thy land like "a flood to the daughter of Tarshish." Old Version. The expression may, however, relate to the ships of Tarshish, with which Tyre carried on her commerce and acquired her greatness. (14. Note, 1 Kings x. 22.)—"Work thine 'own land, for indeed the ships come no more to thee 'from Carthage.' Sept. That is, 'employ thyself in agriculture, for trade is ruined.'

V. 11. Either Nebuchadnezzar, or Alexander the Great, may here be intended; or God himself, as employing them. Both of these mighty conquerors, "stretched their "hand over the sea, and shook the kingdoms:" and each of them besieged and took Tyre. But they had their com-

'against 'the merchant-city to destroy: the 'strong-holds thereof.

12 And he said, 'Thou shalt no more rejoice, O 'thou oppressed virgin, 'daughter of Zidon: arise, 'pass over to Chittim; 'there also shalt thou have no rest.

13 Behold the 'land of the Chaldeans: this people was not, till 'the Assyrian founded it 'for them that dwell in the wilderness: they set up the towers thereof, they raised up the palaces thereof; 'and he brought it to ruin.

mission from God, to destroy the strong holds of that merchant-city; or "of Canaan." (Marg.) Tyre was the principal strong-hold in the land of Canaan: the word, however, signifies a merchant. (Note, Zech. xiv. 20, 21.)

V. 12. Zidon seems to have been one of the oldest cities in the world: (Marg. Ref.—Note, Gen. xlix. 13:) it is mentioned by Homer, but Tyre is not. Tyre was called "the daughter of Zidon," as built by the Zidonians. 'The prophet calls Tyre an oppressed virgin, because she 'was conquered, and as it were ravished, by her enemies. 'Whereas those cities, which never came into a conqueror's hands, are styled virgins.' Lowth. The Assyrians besieged Tyre, but could not take it: Nebuchadnezzar was its first conqueror; and the inhabitants, no longer able to resist, passed over, in great numbers, to the countries bordering on the Mediterranean: but the colonies of Tyrians, in Greece, Sicily, Spain, or Africa, had no rest. Carthage was a colony from Tyre, and her unsuccessful and ruinous contest with the Romans is well known; and the others were greatly disquieted, and at length reduced by the same power.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Chaldeans, Chasdim, are 'supposed to have had their origin and to have taken their 'name from Chased, the son of Nachor, the brother of 'Abraham.' (Gen. xxii. 22.) 'They were known by that 'name in the time of Moses; who calls Ur in Mesopotamia from whence Abraham came, to distinguish it from 'other places of the same name, Ur of the Chaldeans. And 'Jeremiah calls them an ancient nation. ...' This people "was not," that is, they were of no account, (Deut. xxxii. 21,) they were not reckoned among the great and 'potent nations of the world till of later times; they were 'a rude, uncivilized, barbarous people, without laws, without settled habitations; wandering in a wide desert country (צִי), and addicted to rapine, like the wild Arabians. 'Such they are represented to have been in the time of Job; 'Job i. 17; and such they continued to be till Assur, 'some powerful king of Assyria, gathered them together, 'and settled them in Babylon and the neighbouring country.' Bp. Lowth. 'The Assyrians were at that time,' (when this prophecy was delivered,) 'the great monarchs 'of the East; the Chaldeans were their slaves and subjects: and therefore it is the more extraordinary that the 'prophet should foresee the ... conquest of the Chaldeans.'

Bp. Newton. This obscure people were appointed by the Lord to destroy renowned and haughty Tyre, with all its strong towers, and magnificent palaces.

V. 14. Notes, 1. Ez. xxvi. 15—18. Rev. xviii. 9—20.

V. 15—18. From the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, who in some respects was the founder of the Babylonian monarchy, to the ruin of that monarchy by Cyrus, were exactly seventy years. And for a term equal to the days of this one king, or kingdom, Tyre continued in obscurity and neglect. (Notes, Jer. xxv. 8—27. xxvii. 2—11.) Yet Tyre was not taken by Nebuchadnezzar till nearly the middle of that period. But learned men have also shewn, that it was just seventy years, from the taking of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, to the time, when Darius Hystaspis, by granting some immunities to that city, made way for the recovery of its trade and prosperity.—As covetousness is idolatry, and idolatry is spiritual whoredom; the arts of this commercial city to re-establish her trade are represented by those, which harlots in those days used to draw the attention of their lovers.—For seventy years Tyre had been as a neglected harlot: yet she again employed her former arts, to regain her traffick; and was rendered prosperous by divine Providence. But, in consequence, she corrupted all the kingdoms, with her pride, avarice, and luxury.—In due time, however, the Lord intended to plant the gospel there: then numbers of the Tyrians, being converted to Christ, would use that wealth, which had been acquired by commerce, and about which men generally commit wickedness, to maintain the ministry of the gospel, to feed the poor, and to spread the Christian religion: being able, through their affluence, to provide sufficiently for these expenses, which poorer churches could scarcely defray: and then the wealth of Tyre, which had been as “the hire of a harlot,” would become “holiness to the LORD.” (Marg. Ref. y.—Note, Ps. xlv. 12.)—A church was founded early in Tyre, which became a kind of mother-church to several others, which were connected with it: (Note, Acts xxi. 1—6:) so that Christianity was established at Tyre for some ages, till the Saracens took the city; and from that time it gradually decayed, till it was at length almost entirely desolated. (Notes, Ez. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every advantage, of whatever kind, may become an occasion of mischief to us, through the depravity of our hearts and the temptations of Satan: and therefore commerce, which might be, and sometimes has been, subservient to the noblest purposes, too commonly proves a source of luxury, pride, ostentation, and impiety; and is connected with avarice, fraud, oppression, and cruelty.—As those cities, which have successively tyrannized over the nations of the earth, have successively been made monuments of the divine vengeance; so have those likewise which have been the marts of nations. It behoves the inhabitants of the great commercial capital of Britain to be still for a short space, and to contemplate the fate of Tyre. Like that ancient centre of commerce, this city and nation are replenished by the trade of the whole earth; claim the sovereignty of the ocean; and receive revenues from distant seas and rivers, not less abundant, than the harvest of our fertile plains: and London is at least as “joyous a city,” as ever Tyre was; though it does not boast of so great an antiquity. But Tyre is now laid waste, and there is no house, nor entering in: silence and solitude have erected their empire, where this busy merchant-city stood; and her inhabitants are all either extinct, or removed to other lands! Yet when this prediction was delivered, probably, its wealthy inhabitants could not have believed it possible, that such a change should ensue.—This report may well cause our wealthy, but ungodly citizens, (of whom there are not a few,) to be sorely pained and alarmed: her merchants were, and ours are, “princes, and the honourable of the earth.” But they gloried and trusted in their prosperity, and abused it: and the Lord took his counsel against them on purpose “to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honourable of the earth:” that they, who had forgotten him, should feel his superiority and sovereignty; that the vanity of all earthly prosperity might be manifested; and to shew, how soon infamy must overwhelm all those who do not seek “the honour which cometh from God.”—He is able to raise up enemies against us also, from the most obscure nations, and to bring them from the remotest corners of the earth: and at his commandment some savage conqueror may arise to execute his righteous purposes: nor can any distant country give rest to those, of whom God has said, “there is no rest for them.” (Notes, xlvi. 20—22, v. 22, lvii. 20, 21.)—The accomplishment of the prophecies, through successive ages to the present day, evinces, that every promise and threatening in the sacred volume, will surely take place on those nations, or individuals, to which they belong.—It cannot be calculated how much iniquity is committed by such as are greedy of gain: nor can the manifold artifices be developed, by which crafty traffickers supplant, over-reach, and cheat each other; and seduce the ignorant and unwary.—Numbers regard not what crimes they commit, or tempt others to commit, or what miseries they occasion; provided they do but get their hire, which is often more infamous than that of the vilest prostitute.—But, while men of this character are treasuring up wrath, with their accumulating wealth, and corrupting whole kingdoms by such traffick, as tends to disseminate intemperance or murder; there are some even in our land, who conduct their commercial concerns with far other views, and on very different principles. By honourable gains they possess affluence; and they neither treasure it up in avarice, nor spend it in profligacy or luxury: but consecrate it to the Lord, and employ it to diffuse the knowledge of his truth to distant regions; to provide sufficient and suitable food and raiment for his indigent servants; and to relieve the wants of multitudes, of whom they know no more, than that they are human beings in distress. Now this is noble: and riches thus obtained and expended, are a privilege and a blessing. Thus should Christians conduct business, as the servants of God, and use riches, as his stewards. As vital godliness shall abound, such characters will become more numerous; and then commerce will be rendered a blessing, not only to the cities where it is conducted, but to the human species at large.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—12. Various opinions have prevailed concerning the events predicted in this chapter, which begins a new subject, continued to the end of the twenty-seventh chapter. Some think, that it is a general denunciation of vengeance from God on sinful nations, and on the whole earth: and, like many other prophecies, it is couched in such terms, as may apply to many similar events, and can scarcely have its full accomplishment, except in the consummation of all things. But it seems more immediately to contain a series of prophecy, relating to the nation of Israel, and to the church, which is yet fulfilling, but not accomplished. ‘After having foretold the destruction of the foreign nations, enemies of Judah, the prophet declares the judgments impending on the people of God themselves, for their wickedness and apostasy; and the desolation that shall be brought on their whole country.’ Bp. Lowth.—The desolation of the kingdom of Israel by the Assyrians, and that of Judah by the Chaldeans; and the ravages afterwards committed by Antiochus Epiphanes, may be adverted to: but the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersion of the Jews into all nations, with those events connected with that awful dispensation, and resulting from it, seem principally intended; till at the close of the chapter, a transition appears to be made to other important events.—The same original word is rendered “the earth” and “the land:” and generally means the land of Israel. When the Chaldeans, and afterwards the Romans, took Jerusalem; then “the LORD emptied and wasted that “land, and turned it upside down,” that none of its inhabitants might continue in it: and in the latter dispensation, instead of sending them to some specified place, for a limited term of years, as before, he scattered them abroad over the face of the earth, and their dispersion continues to the present day. The distinction between priests and people was soon lost, along with their genealogies and all ranks and orders of men were involved in indiscriminate ruin. Thus the land, being emptied and plundered, as it were “mourneth and fadeth away,” and is become at this day as barren, as it formerly was fruitful.—By “the “world,” may be meant, the whole of the Jewish economy; the Mosaic dispensation and the civil establishment of Israel as a nation, which waxed old, languished and expired, together with the destruction of all the haughty despisers of their lowly Messiah. For the land had long been polluted by the crimes; (Notes, Lev. xviii. 24—30. Num. xxxv. 31—34;) especially by the profaneness and hypocrisy of the people, who not only transgressed the laws of God, but “made them of none effect by their “traditions:” they not only changed his ordinances, but they expressly brake the national covenant, which had endured for ages, by rejecting the promised Messiah, in and through whom it had been ratified: and thus they were deprived of all their covenanted privileges. Then, the curse of God devoured and desolated the land: his wrath, like fire, burned up the inhabitants, till very few in comparison were left of that devoted nation. Their abused plenty and sensual mirth ceased; nay, the temple-musick, and sacred psalmody, and solemn feasts, were put an end to; or rather were turned into lamentations, howlings, and bitterness of soul. The city, having become a scene of confusion, by the intestine discords of its inhabitants; and having experienced all the horrors of famine and pestilence in the extreme, was broken down by the Romans, and the Jews were excluded from all access to it. In vain did they then cry out for some cordial to support them under their overwhelming distress: “all joy was darkened, “and the mirth of the land was gone. The city was left “desolate, the gate was smitten with destruction.” (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 29—31. Mark xiii. 24—31. Luke xxi. 20—28.)

‘and Judah, drove the people away, and dispersed them ‘all over the neighbouring countries. They fled to Egypt, ‘to Asia Minor, to the islands, and the coasts of Greece. ‘They were to be found in great numbers in most of the ‘principal cities of those countries. Alexandria was in a ‘great measure peopled by them. They had synagogues ‘for their worship, in many places; and were greatly instrumental in propagating the knowledge of the true ‘God among these heathen nations, and preparing them ‘for the reception of Christianity.’ Bp. Lowth.—The word rendered “the sea,” is sometimes translated, the west: because the Mediterranean sea was the western border of Canaan. (Notes, xlix. 9—13. Hos. xi. 8—11.)—The chief accomplishment of this prophecy, however, seems to have been after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. At that season, there was a small company, like the gleanings of the vine or the olive, which had embraced Christianity: (Note, xvii. 4—8;) and wherever they were dispersed among the nations, and in the isles of the sea, they lifted up their voice in songs of praise, whilst they beheld the majesty of God displayed in accomplishing these predictions; and mingled thanksgivings with their fervent prayers: nay, they excited one another to glorify God, in the fiery trial of persecution, and though banished to the remotest regions. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) The destruction of Jerusalem was exceedingly conducive to the establishment of the Christian church; and in this respect was the subject of joy and praise to the primitive Christians, especially to the Gentile churches.

V. 16. This verse seems to intimate the calling of the Gentiles, as the consequence of the rejection of the Jews. While the converts to Christianity, from the uttermost parts of the earth, were ascribing glory to the righteous Lord: the prophet, personating the Jewish nation, lamented his leanness; that is, the small number of believers found in Israel, the corrupted state of the church, and the miseries which had come upon the nation. The Jews continued to be most cruelly treated by their treacherous and violent enemies: but, their own hypocrisy, and enormous wickedness; their avarice and deceit; and their most virulent persecutions of those who embraced the gospel, seem to be more especially the subject of the prophetic lamentation. As, however, the words rendered “the uttermost part of the earth,” or “the wing of the earth,” (marg.) are supposed to mean the extremities of the land of Judah, it is by some interpreted in a more restricted sense. ‘The prophet speaks in the person of the inhabitants of the land still remaining there; who should be

 tresses from the inroads and depredations of their powerful enemies. ... vi. 13.’ Bp. Lowth. Yet there is little proof that the Jews, dispersed in the land after the taking of Jerusalem, in any sense used songs giving “glory to the righteous.” “From the uttermost part of the earth,” ‘means the same as “from the isles of the sea,” in the foregoing verses.’ Lowth.

V. 17—20. In taking wild beasts, the hunters used to terrify them, that in their fright they might run into their pits, or be taken in their snares. Thus terror would drive the Jews into those very places, in which destruction was prepared for them, and every thing would concur in preventing their escape. (Note, Am. v. 18—20.) For the flood-gates of divine vengeance being opened from above, the foundations of the earth would shake, as if the end of the world were come.—‘God’s wrath and vengeance should be over and under them, so that they should not any more escape than at Noah’s flood.’ (Notes, Gen. vii. 10—12.
 20—23. xix. 24, 25.) There were many great earthquakes about the time of the siege of Jerusalem: and Christ predicted the destruction of that city in terms very similar, and which may also be interpreted of the consummation of all things. (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 29—41. Rev. xx. 11—15.) Indeed the transgression of that land, especially in “crucifying the Lord of glory,” was heavy upon it; and thus it fell and has never risen again to this day, as it did in comparatively a very short time, after the Babylonish captivity. ‘The three Hebrew words, Pachad, Pachath, ‘and Pach ... have an affinity of sound with each other,
 ‘which cannot be translated into another language.’ Lowth.
 The form of expression seems to have been proverbial.
 (Jer. xlviii. 43, 44.)

V. 21, 22. Here a transition appears to be made, from the ruin of the Jewish nation for opposing the gospel, to that of the antichristian powers, which will introduce a general prevalence of true religion: and such transitions are common in the prophets. But the subversion of the idolatrous Roman empire, (after it had executed God’s judgments on Jerusalem,) to make way for the firmer establishment of Christianity in the primitive ages, may also be intended, as a shadow of the other still more decisive events. However that may be, all the host of the high ones and the kings of the earth, who oppose the gospel, will be gathered as prisoners into a dungeon, deprived of power to do further mischief; and at last produced to take their trial and receive their sentence. (Notes, Josh. x. 16 —18. 24—27.) ‘Some commentators understand, by “the host of the high ones which are on high,” the devil

 ‘and his angels, who are described by St. Paul by the ‘names of principalities and powers, dwelling in high ‘or heavenly places, and having power in the air, or lower ‘region of the world; (Eph. ii. 2. vi. 12;) and then by ‘“the kings of the earth,” must be meant those earthly ‘princes, who are influenced by them, and are their in‘struments in abetting idolatry, or persecuting God’s ‘truth. ... The verse alludes to the custom of kings who ‘used to confine the chief commanders of their enemies, ‘whom they took prisoners, and reserve them to some ex‘traordinary day of triumph, and then bring them out to ‘publick punishment. ... I cannot find any explication of ‘this verse so agreeable to the natural sense of the words,
 ‘as that of a late learned writer upon the Revelation, xix.
 ‘6; who explains it of the kings of the earth, who made ‘war with Christ and his saints, at Armageddon, Rev.
 ‘xvi. 16. xix. 19, and being there discomfited, lay languish‘ing under the sentence of condemnation, till after the ‘battle of Gog and Magog, xx. 8—10, when they were,
 ‘together with Satan their leader, punished with everlast‘ing destruction.’ Lowth. (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix.
 Dan. xi. 40—45. Rev. xvi. 12—16, v. 16. xix. 11—21. xx.
 7—10.) Events, yet in futurity, are doubtless predicted:
 but, probably, no man will distinctly know what events, till the prophecy has received its accomplishment. Nothing is spoken expressly concerning the restoration of Israel; yet it seems implied.

V. 23. When this victory has been won, the Millennium will be introduced: the Lord will set up his kingdom in its fullest glory on earth; and its splendour shall eclipse and put to shame, not only the borrowed light of the moon, but the light of the sun also; that is, all the majesty of the mightiest kingdoms, as well as that of the subordinate ones. He will then reign, as “LORD of hosts” upon his mercy-seat, and among his ancient people, or the elders or ministers of his church, in unrivalled and unclouded glory and majesty. (Notes, lx. 15—22. Rev. xix. 1—8. xx. 4—6. xxi. 22—27. xxii. 1—5.) The millennium seems especially predicted, but in language which also suits the heavenly state.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

They, whose treasures and felicity are laid up on earth, will soon be reduced to indigence and misery; for the Lord will make the whole of it “waste and empty;” nay, he will “turn it upside down, and shake all its inhabitants out of it.” Even in great national convulsions, the superior orders are often first exposed to peril, alarm, and ruin: and in the great day of God, the ungodly priest, or prince, or wealthy man, will have more to answer for, and will receive deeper condemnation, than his inferiors: and this will be his only distinction. But the Lord has spoken the word, and the earth, which has been defiled by man’s sin, must wax old and vanish away; and all the proud and haughty inhabitants of it must perish. All the miseries, which in every age have been experienced, are the effect of that curse, which is incurred by transgressing the law of God, and violating his righteous covenants. His wrath, like fire, consumes all before it: it will burn up the earth; (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 5—13;) and it forms a hell for the everlasting punishment of the wicked. There all mirth will cease; no joy can enter; even hope expires at the portal: all is destruction and despair, “weeping, wailing, and “gnashing of teeth” for ever. Let then the merry-hearted, who now drink wine with festive songs, and add every incentive to sensual indulgence, pause, and reflect, and ask themselves, what they will do to eternity, when all such expedients fail. Even in this world an hour may come, in which “strong drink may be bitter to them that drink it,” and every enjoyment become irksome; and indeed such hours often occur in almost every man’s experience: but at length carnal mirth must be turned into mourning and anguish of spirit; and how much better is it now to mourn with penitent sorrow, which makes way for holy hope and endless joy, than to spend eternity in hopeless lamentations!—No nation has ever been visited as the Jews were, after they had broken their covenant, and “crucified “the Lord of glory.” Thus, in this world communities, and hereafter individuals, will be punished with a severity proportioned, not only to the crimes which they have perpetrated, but to the advantages which they have abused: and those who change the truths and ordinances of God, for their own conjectures and inventions, or human traditions, will be condemned as the most heinous of those, who have “broken his everlasting covenant,” or refuse to accede to it.

escaped the contagion of impiety and wickedness, and have been preserved from general destruction; but alas! they have hitherto been only as a gleanings. They, however, can sing the praises of God and glorify his name, in the hottest fires of persecution, and in all places whither they can be driven. They see and adore his majesty, in those dispensations which overwhelm the wicked; and they should excite each other to abound more and more in his pleasant service.—Let us bless God, that “we have heard “songs,” ascribing glory “to the LORD our Righteous-“ness,” in this isle of the seas, this uttermost part of the earth: but we have also reason humbly to lament, that the number of true Christians among us is so small; and that our own graces and holy duties are so feeble and defective. The difference, however, between the weakest believer and every unbeliever is essential: the former shall surely be preserved, the latter cannot possibly escape “the per-“dition of ungodly men,” when the windows of heaven shall be opened to pour down vengeance, and the foundations of the earth shall shake, and it shall sink under the weight of man’s transgressions, to rise no more.—Happy then are they, who take warning by the sentences denounced against others, or executed on them! for as surely as the predictions against the unbelieving Jews took effect, and were exactly fulfilled; so will every impenitent sinner sink under the weight of his transgression, and rise no more. But the mystery of Providence is not yet finished: many kings with their armies must fall before the power of the divine Redeemer: the ruin of his enemies must make way for the universal establishment of his kingdom. Then the Sun of Righteousness will appear in his meridian glory; all other real or pretended luminaries will be eclipsed and confounded, and “all kings shall bow down “before him, all nations shall do him service.” (Notes, Ps. lxxii. 17—19. lxxxvi. 9, 10. Rev. xi. 15—18.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1. The prophet here praises God, not so much for mercies personal or national, already received, but in the prospect of the accomplishment of the prophecies, which he had just delivered: for even the vengeance to be executed first on the Jews, and then on other opposers of true religion, was intended for the benefit of the church, and its final complete triumph; to which every believer is more nearly related, than to any man or body of men after the flesh.—Rejoicing in JEHOVAH, as his Portion, as well as his Governor, and penetrating into the remotest futurity; the holy prophet conceived the most exalted ideas of the divine perfections, and determined to extol them in the loftiest strains of praise. His wonderful works to Israel in former times, and those far more glorious works which Isaiah viewed as already performed, accorded to the divine counsels of old, which had been revealed in prophecies and promises, and were essen-

V. 2. Egypt had been desolated in order to Israel's deliverance; the cities of Canaan had been destroyed, that the Israelites might possess their inheritance; Babylon and Tyre, those defenced cities, full of palaces, inhabited by strangers to God and his worship, would be made a desolation, and never be rebuilt; and even Jerusalem would cease to be the holy city, and become "a palace of strangers," after the Jews had rejected Christ, and soon after it would be made "a ruinous heap." Rome also is doomed to be destroyed, to make way for the universal success of Christianity. (Notes, xiii. 18—22. xiv. 21—27. Rev. xviii.) These, and other similar events, especially relating to the ruin of all Antichristian opposers of the gospel, in the latter days, seem to have been present to the prophet's mind, when he wrote these words.—'By "strangers," are meant, 'heathens, "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," as 'St. Paul calls them, and enemies to it.' Lowth.

V. 3—5. These wonderful displays of divine power and justice, will induce many potent, or fierce and terrible nations, to stand in awe of God, and render glory to him. The accomplishment of some of the prophecies against Babylon had this effect on the Persian kings: (Ezra i. vi. vii.) and this was a shadow of the future conversion of the nations unto Christ. It will then appear most evident, that the Lord has, from age to age, protected his Church of humble, poor, and despised believers, in all their distresses, and against every persecutor. When the fury of their enemies menaced their destruction, as the violent hail-storm drives against the wall; his power preserved them, as in a strong tower, both safe and undismayed, till the tumult of their foes was silenced in their destruction. And when temptations resembled the sultry heat of the sun, in the sandy desert; he interposed his protection, as "the shadow of a cloud," till the heat was abated: and the flourishing prosperity of their most terrible assailants was at length brought low. 'The verse ... more fully expressed
'would run thus: "As a thick cloud interposing tempers
'the heat of the sun on the burnt soil; so shalt thou, by
'the interposition of thy power, bring low and abate the

'tumult of the proud, and the triumph of the formidable.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, iv. 5, 6. xxvi. 1—6. 20, 21. xxxii. 1, 2. 16—20. Ez. xiii. 10—16. Matt. vii. 24—27. Rev. xix. 1—6.)

V. 6—8. These verses evidently contain a prophecy of the "sufferings of Christ, and the glory which should follow," (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12,) from the coming of Christ to the end of the world. The Lord of hosts would make a feast; in "the mountain of the Lord's house," (ii. 2—5,) on mount Zion, the type of the true church. (Notes, Heb. xii. 18—21. Rev. xiv. 1—5.) This feast would be provided for all people, or peoples, (plur.) Gentiles as well as Jews, and would consist of the choicest viands, in great variety and plenty, and of the richest wines well refined by continuing long upon the lees. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jer. xlviii. 11.) Under these emblems all spiritual blessings, as conferred through his atonement and mediation, are shadowed forth. (Notes, Prov. ix. 1—6. Matt. xxii. 1—14. P. O. 1—15. Note, Luke xiv. 15—24.)—At Jerusalem, the partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles was broken down by the crucifixion of Christ: and thence the gospel was diffused through the nations of the earth. Thus the ignorance, delusion, and idolatry, which, like a veil, or covering, were spread over all the nations, would be removed, torn, and at length destroyed. (Notes, xxix. 9—12. 2 Cor. iii. 7—18.) This was begun by the conversion of the Gentiles in the days of the apostles, and has been in some degree carried on, by the propagation of the gospel dispelling heathen darkness, to this present day: and at length "the knowledge of the glory of God shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea." This will continue almost to the day of judgment; when, by the glorious resurrection of all believers to eternal life, and the final confinement of sin and misery to hell, "death will be swallowed up in victory." (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 50—54. Rev. xx. 11—15, v. 14.) Then all tears will be wiped away, by the Lord himself, from the faces of all his people; every reproach will be removed from their character; an end will be put to all correction and rebuke; and from the whole earth they shall be gathered into his kingdom. (Notes, xxxv. 8—10. liv. 15—17. Rev. vii. 13—17. xxi. 1—4.) Israel is not here mentioned: but the reproach, under which that people has so long lain, and which will be turned into honour, by their conversion and restoration, is supposed by some to be specially intended.

V. 9. When Immanuel appeared on earth, those who waited for him, welcomed him as their God and Saviour: and as others became acquainted with him, they were ready, with Thomas, to confess to him, "My Lord, and my God;" (Note, John xx. 24—29, v. 28); and to rejoice in his salvation. The church yet waits for him to come and set up his kingdom, and to turn all her mourning into joy; being prepared to welcome that event with triumphant praise, "honouring him, even as the Father that sent him." Every believer expects his final appearance, as "the great God and our Saviour." (Notes, Tit. ii. 11—14.) And when he shall come, and "all the nations of the earth shall wail because of him," (Note, Rev. i. 7.) these words will express the very heart of every one of his redeemed people; as about to receive the completion of his salvation, and the fruition in body and soul of his expected felicity.—"In that day shall they say: Behold, this is our God; we have trusted in him, and he hath saved us. This is JEHOVAH; we have trusted in him; we will rejoice, and triumph, in his salvation." Bp. Lowth.

V. 10—12. (Notes, xi. 11—16. Num. xxii. 4. xxiv. 16, 17. Deut. xxiii. 3—6. Jer. ix. 25, 26. Zeph. ii. 8—10.) Every enemy of the church, like Moab, shall be trodden down, as when the sheaves have been threshed the straw is trodden down upon the dunghill: a most energetick similitude to shew the contempt which will be poured upon them. (Marg. Ref. c.) The Lord shall also extend his powerful hands, on every side, to crush his obstinate foes; as the swimmer stretches forth his hands to their utmost extent, to support himself on the water. Thus he will abase their pride, and spoil them of their prosperity; and reduce to the dust all their strong holds, and their most determined opposition. "God shall bring down their pride, with the sudden gripe of his hands." Bp. Lowth. This seems the more accurate translation: the strong and powerful stroke of the hands and arms, used in swimming, is supposed, by some, to be alluded to. (Notes, xiii. 19—22. xxvi. 5, 6. xxxii. 16—20.)—Perhaps an allusion to Christ, as lifted up on the cross, with his hands extended and nailed to it, might be intended, under the figure of the Lord's stretching forth his hands in the midst of his enemies. Then and there he spoiled and triumphed over the powers of darkness, and ensured the victory over every enemy for himself and his church. (Note, Col. ii. 13—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

True faith simply credits "the sure testimonies of God," as "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance," and relies on his immutable truth to perform his promises: and thus the believer anticipates, and praises the Lord for future blessings, as if already in possession. This faith influences every possessor to holy obedience and spiritual worship: and if we can on this ground be confident that the Lord is our God and Portion for ever; this will animate us with the desire of exalting and praising him among our fellow Christians, and fellow sinners, here on earth.—All his wonderful works, of creation, providence, and redemption, accord to his eternal counsels and decrees. He has already proved many of these counsels, which he revealed to his servants the prophets, to be "faithfulness and truth;" and in due time all the rest will be evidently accomplished.—Frequently he reduced powerful cities and splendid palaces into ruinous heaps, never to be rebuilt: because of the oppression of his people Israel. But since that nation crucified their Messiah, these interpositions in their favour have ceased; for ages they have been oppressed with apparent impunity; Jerusalem itself has been made a heap; and the Lord's care has been transferred from them to the Christian church: yet at the predicted time, he will again make of "the defenced city a ruin;" that "the strong people may glorify him," and reverence his holy name.—The Lord ever was, and ever will be, the Refuge of poor and distressed believers: and, having provided them a shelter from the storm of his righteous judgments, and taught them to flee to it, all the powers of earth and hell may in vain unite their force and fury: their tumult shall be silenced, their fury disappointed, and their pride and terrible power shall be brought low; whilst the poor servants of God shall enjoy inward consolation in the midst of trouble, and at length a triumphant deliverance.—When the Father "loved us, and gave his Son to be a propitiation for our sins," he prepared a feast for our souls: the believer finds that "the flesh of Christ is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed;" (Notes, John vi. 47—58. P. O. 47—59); and deriving from him pardon, peace, and a joyful hope, his "soul is satisfied as with marrow and fatness," and exhilarated as with the richest wines. (Notes, Ps. lxiii. 5—8.) Yet this is only an antepast of that eternal feast which is intended for him: and there is no sinner of any nation, who should not be invited to this feast, and assured of a hearty welcome, if he come for it in the appointed way.—Blessed be God, the gospel has already rent in many places the thick covering, which was spread over the nations, and our land is favoured with a glorious light: may all the inhabitants of it “walk in the light, and be the children of light!” and may the Lord destroy entirely the remains of this veil from every part of the Christian church, from the hearts of unbelieving Jews, and from the Mohammedan and Pagan nations! This will in due time be effected, and the Sun of Righteousness shall illuminate every corner of the earth.—At length the Lord will come to judgment, the dead shall be raised, the books shall be opened, believers shall be welcomed, as the children of God, to their eternal inheritance, “death will be swallowed up in victory,” “God shall wipe away all their tears” and rebukes, and they shall “shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.” In the day when they shall arise from the grave, and see their divine Redeemer come to perfect their felicity; with what energy of gratitude, love, joy, and triumphant exultation will they exclaim, “Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he hath saved us: “this is JEHOVAH, we have waited for him, we will be “glad and rejoice in his salvation!”—But the same almighty arm, which is engaged to save his Church, is stretched forth to destroy all despisers. He will then tread them under foot, with the utmost disdain and abhorrence. Those hands, which once were extended on the cross, to make way for our salvation, will be extended to destroy all impenitent sinners. Then his victory over the devil, and all his proud and potent servants, will be completed; every strong hold will be levelled; and the last enemy put under the Redeemer’s feet. “Therefore, my beloved brethren, “be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the “work of the Lord; forasmuch, as ye know that your “labour is not in vain in the Lord.” (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 54—58.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. The prophet seems still to keep in view the whole series of predicted events, which has been considered. The preservation of Jerusalem from the Assyrians, the return of the Jews from Babylon, and their deliverance from the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, if at all meant, could only be regarded as types, or earnest, of more spiritual and glorious events. For the day here especially intended, seems to be that future season, when the New Testament Babylon shall be laid low and strong city; ^d salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks.

For “salvation “hath God appointed for walls and bulwarks:” the power, truth, and love of God, in Jesus Christ, render his church an impregnable fortress. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5, 6. xii. 4—6, xxv. 9—12.) It is highly probable, likewise, that this prophecy will be literally accomplished, in the conversion of Israel, and their re-establishment in the promised land.

V. 2. The decisive victory, obtained over antichristian powers, will prepare the way for the immense enlargement of the church. Those who embrace and hold fast the truth as it is in Jesus Christ, become “a righteous nation,” incorporated under his government, united among themselves, obedient to his laws, and safe under his protection. (Notes, i. 25—27. lx. 10—14. Ps. cvi. 4, 5. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) Every new convert is enrolled as a citizen of this strong city: and ministers and Christians should unite by every effort to open the gates; that new converts from every part of the earth may be admitted to dwell in it and share its franchises.—The calling of the Gentiles, in the primitive times, was a partial accomplishment of this prediction: but it will be more fully performed, when Judah and Israel shall be converted to the Saviour, and “the fulness of the gentiles shall come in.” (Notes, Luke xxi. 20—24, v. 24. Rom. xi. 16—32.)

V. 3, 4. “Thou preservest continued peace to the mind “that leaneth on thee, &c.” “This is to be taken for a “man, who with his whole thought and soul confidently “leans on God, through Jesus Christ, as it is explained at “the end of the verse.”—The man, of whom this may be said, stays and rests his hope on the wisdom, power, truth, and mercy of God, in all his undertakings, difficulties, and perils; and refers his concerns to him, expecting direction, assistance, success, and comfort from him. And thus the Lord keeps him in perfect peace, or “in peace, peace:” in every kind of peace, peace of conscience, tranquillity, resignation, confidence and cheerful expectation, proportioned to the degree in which the heart is thus stayed on God. Therefore an exhortation is annexed: “Trust in “the LORD for ever,” or perpetually and for eternity: for “in JAH JEHOVAH,” the self-existent and unchangeable God, “is everlasting Strength:” He is “the Rock of “ages,” or of eternity. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 3, 4. 2 Sam.

xxii. 2, 3. Ps. lxii. 1, 2. 8—10. lxviii. 4. cxii. 7. John xiv. 1. 27, 28. 1 Pet. i. 17—21.)—This seems addressed to the church, to encourage her to wait patiently under her persecutions, in full expectation of the glorious times predicted; and thus to every true believer as a part of the church.

V. 5, 6. As the fall of Babylon was connected with the restoration of the Jews; so the total ruin of all anti-christian powers, and of Rome, will make way for the established peace and prosperity of the church, and the restoration of Israel. This the Lord will speedily accomplish: the poor and needy will soon trample on the ruins of the strong holds of every Antichrist: and the most despised instruments, the witnesses who prophesy in sackcloth, and their despised followers, shall be able to execute the Lord's purposes. (Notes, xxv. 10—12. Ez. xxxix. 21—29. Dan. xii. 1. Zech. x. 5—12. 1 Cor. i. 26—31. Rev. xi. 3—14.)

V. 7. Whilst the ungodly “know not at what they “stumble,” the righteous Lord makes the way of his upright servants plain and level: he removes obstructions and stumbling blocks; he proportions their strength to their trials; he watches over their steps, and guides them in the way of uprightness. (Marg. Ref.) “Thou wilt “make equal the path of the righteous.” (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 3. Ps. i. 4—6. xxv. 8—10. xxxvii. 23, 24. Prov. iv. 18, 19. 26.)

V. 8, 9. The prophet here declares how the servants of God behaved under their difficulties. They waited the performance of his promises, in the way of his commandments, or while enduring his chastisements. Their chief desire was to know and glorify his name, and to see him glorified, to keep his perfections and wonderful works in remembrance, and to acts as in his immediate presence. Each of them could say before God, that, in their retirements, and in the darkest seasons of adversity, they had sought him and his favour, with their inmost souls, and as their great concern: and they had witnessed or expected the desolating judgments, which had wasted, or would waste, the nations, in hope that the inhabitants would learn righteousness by means of them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. lxiii. 5, 6. Cant. iii. 1—5. Matt. vi. 33, 34.) “Even “in the night-season, when others sleep, hath my soul been “taken up with thee.” Bp. Hall. “I will seek thee at the “dawn of day.”—“With my soul have I desired thee in “the night; yea with my inmost spirit in the morn have I “sought thee.” Bp. Lowth. (Note, viii. 20.)

V. 10, 11. Impenitent sinners “despise the riches of “the Lord's goodness and long-suffering;” (Note, Rom. ii. 4—6;) and prosperity renders them less disposed than before, to receive the instructions of righteousness: so that in Israel, “the land of uprightness,” where the means of grace were afforded, and good examples set, men generally continued unjust and profane, and shut their eyes to all the discoveries of the glorious power and holiness of God! (Note, v. 1—7. ix. 13—17. Mic. vi. 9.) Even his hand, when lifted up to inflict gentle punishments, or to threaten more terrible vengeance, was wilfully disregarded, and his judgments were ascribed to other causes. But the Lord would constrain them to see his hand, and be ashamed of their envy, and enmity to his people, by causing the fire prepared against his enemies to devour them: or, “They shall see with shame the zeal of thy people: “yea, the fire shall burn up thy adversaries,” or “thy “zeal for thy people.” Bp. Lowth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) This may be considered as the language of believers, acknowledging the justice of God, in giving up the Jews into the hands of the Chaldeans. It accords also to the conduct of that nation, previous to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: and it will be verified in a still more stupendous manner, in those great events, which seem to be more immediately predicted. (Notes, 1—6.)

V. 12—18. The church, or Israel, here addresses the 13 O LORD our God, * other lords beside thee have had dominion over us: but ¹by thee only will we make mention of thy name.

14 They are ^mdead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, ⁿand made all their memory to perish.

Lord. Whatever desolations he brought on hypocritical nations, he would certainly "ordain peace" for his true people: he had wrought "all their works in them;" they were of that kind which his grace produces: (Note, John iii. 19—21;) or "for them;" he had often formerly made them to triumph over their enemies, and rendered their endeavours successful. (Marg. Ref. †.) They had indeed often been subjected to other lords, who not only enslaved their bodies, but usurped authority over their consciences, and harassed them with persecutions: (Notes, li. 17—23;) but now by the grace of God, they were determined to make mention, as his worshippers and servants, of him alone; to renounce all idols, superstitions, and iniquities; and to expect from him only complete deliverance from all oppressors. (Note, Hos. xiv. 1—3, v. 3.) 'It is by thee only that we have been delivered out of their hands; and therefore upon thee alone will we call as our God and Saviour.' Lowth. We may suppose this intended as the language of the church, in that crisis, when the New Testament Babylon shall be destroyed, and the complete victory over all remaining antichristian powers confidently expected. (Rev. xviii. xix.) Their chief seducers and oppressing tyrants were now dead, and they would no more arise to usurp authority over them, for the Lord had visited and destroyed them with infamy. (Notes, 19. Dan. xii. 2, 3. Rev. xx. 4—6.) The righteous nation, before-mentioned (2), was indeed greatly increased, and God was glorified; and, instead of being confined to Judea, it was extended to all the ends of the earth. This was done in answer to the prayers of his people in former times: when troubled by their persecutors and chastened for their sins, they waited on him, and poured out fervent supplications before him for deliverance. For a long time the church had been like a travailing woman, who endures all the pangs and anguish of child-birth, without obtaining the expected deliverance. Thus, under long delays, the pious remnant had been in great distress, and waited, with wrestling prayers and anxious expectation, for the predicted deliverance: till they were ready to conclude, that those glorious times would never arrive; that they had misunderstood the prophecies; and had conceived false hopes, which would produce nothing but painful exertions and distressing disappointments. For they had not been able to effect any important deliverances from their enemies, neither had the inhabitants of the world fallen, either into willing subjection to Christ, or as crushed by his power. The dispersion of Israel may be meant, by the clause, "Thou hast removed it to the ends of the earth, (15)" but several things in the concluding verses of the chapter seem wholly inapplicable to them, in their unconverted state.

They are deceased, &c. (14) "They are deceased tyrants, they shall not rise." Bp. Lowth. (רָצוּ). Notes, 19. Prov. ii. 18.

V. 19. (Notes, Ez. xxxvii. 1—14.) The conversion of the Jews; the spiritual resurrection elsewhere predicted, (Rev. xx. 4;) and the flourishing of the church, which had seemed dead, through the corruptions of popery, the prevalence of infidelity and various kinds of antichristianity, seem here especially foretold. We may consider Christ himself as the Speaker, and addressing the church: his resurrection from the dead was the earnest of all the future deliverances which were predicted; and they are the continuation of that power which was then exerted. (Note, Eph. i. 15—23.) Or the church may be considered as addressing God. Her cause is his also: those who have been put to death for his sake, and for righteousness' sake, are "his dead men," and shall live: he will recover her, as a dead body laid in the grave is miraculously raised to life again, by fully restoring her prosperity. (Notes, Hos. vi. 1—3. xiii. 14. xiv. 4—8.) For the power of his grace, (like the dew, or rain, that causes the herbs which seem dead to revive,) would be effectual to raise her from the lowest state of depression. (Note, lxvi. 10—14, v. 14.)—'The Hebrew runs thus, "My dead body...shall arise." The noun is in the singular number, and the verb in the plural, for the singular is taken distributively for every dead body... (Ps. xii. 7.)...The two sentences "Thy dead men shall live," and "My dead bodies shall arise," are equivalent; they are called the church's dead, as members of that mystical body, and God's or Christ's dead, ... from the interest he hath in them, and because he hath promised to raise them up at the last day. (John vi. 39.)' Lowth.—In this figurative resurrection the deceased saints arise, but not the deceased persecutors. (14. Notes, Rev. xi. 7—12. xx. 4—6.)—The last clause may be rendered, “the land of tyrants shalt thou cause to fall,” or, “shall she cause to fall;” that is, the church shall prevail against all oppressors, and cast them down.—The original word is often translated giants. (Note, 12—18, v. 14.) “But the earth shall cast forth, as an abortion, the deceased tyrants.” The deliverance of the people of God from a state of the lowest depression is explained by images plainly taken from the resurrection of the dead. ... This deliverance is expressed with a manifest opposition to what is here said above (14) of the great lords and tyrants under whom they had groaned. “They are dead, they shall not live;” “they are deceased tyrants, they shall not rise:” that they should be destroyed utterly, and should never be restored to their former power and glory. It appears from hence, that the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was at that time a popular and common doctrine: for an image which is assumed, to express or represent any thing, in the way of allegory or metaphor, whether poetical or prophetic, must be an image commonly known and understood; otherwise it will not answer the purpose for which it is assumed. Bp. Lowth.

V. 20, 21. The Lord, by his prophet, here exhorts his people, through successive ages, when under persecutions and oppressions, to wait with cheerful expectation for these glorious events. Let them retire from the world, and, by faith and prayer, take refuge in him, and patiently wait the event. Thus, as Noah in the ark, as the Israelites in Egypt eating the passover, while the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled on the lintel and door-posts, (Note, Ex. xii. 22, 23,) or as one sheltered in a secret chamber, they would be safe and uninterrupted, amid the heaviest storms: and in a very little time, the vindictive wrath of their enemies, and the corrections of their Father, would terminate. For the Lord was about to remove from his mercy-seat, (his place in Israel) to the tribunal of justice, in order to pass sentence, and inflict punishment, on the wicked; (Note, Hos. v. 15;) but especially upon the murderers of his people: and then the immense quantities of blood, which had been shed in wars, persecutions, and oppressions, would be disclosed in the open view of the world, and all the murderers without exception receive condign punishment. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. iv. 10—12. Num. xxxv. 31—34. Ez. xxiv. 6—8. Matt. xxiii. 34—36. Rev. vi. 9—17. xvii. 6. xix. 1—6.)—Let any one carefully compare this chapter with the latter part of the Revelation, from the sixteenth to the twentieth chapter inclusive; let him especially consider the vengeance to be executed on those, “who were drunk with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus;” and the two descriptions of persons distinguished as rising or not rising, at the entrance of the millennium, (Note, Rev. xx. 4—6,) and then let him determine whether the prophet Isaiah, and the apostle John, do not predict precisely the same events.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, whose “names are written in the book of life,” are “kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.” The immutable promise and oath of the Lord, securing the everlasting covenant, and all his infinite perfections engaged for its accomplishment, are the impregnable walls and bulwarks of this strong city, which will still stand secure, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up. (Notes, Rev. xxi.) He himself has given orders, that the gates of this city should be “open to every one that keepeth the truth,” to every one who, by repentance and faith, becomes one of that righteous and holy nation, which is governed by our incarnate Immanuel: and his ministers should take care that every hindrance to the establishment of the humble believer, may be removed, and that sinners may be encouraged to join themselves to the Lord.—Blessed indeed are they who trust in God! Proportioned to our holy confidence in him, shall be our unspeakable peace: and he deems himself bound in honour to answer the expectations of all, who renounce every other dependence, to rely on his faithful word. Let us then “acknowledge him in all our ways,” rely on him in all our difficulties, and fear no enemies: for if “the LORD JEHOVAH, in whom is everlasting Strength,” be for us, “who can be against us?” By him, the poor of his people shall set their feet upon the necks of their most insulting enemies: and, in prospect of that victory, should triumph in his praises during their sharpest conflicts. But he, to whom these privileges belong, walks in the even path of uprightness. Our righteous God abhors hypocrisy; and, as in perfect faithfulness he directs the path of the just, so he weighs and detects that of the deceiver, and appoints him his portion with the unbelievers. (P. O. Dan. v. 18—31.)—Those who trust in the Lord, must also wait on him in his ordinances, expecting his promised blessings at the appointed time: and if his favour, and the discoveries of his glory, are desired as our felicity, they will solace us in solitude and affliction; nay, we shall then especially seek the Lord with earnestness, and with our whole heart. The believer knows in his own case, that corrections are a salutary means of producing a teachable disposition, and submission to the will of God: and this encourages his hope and prayer, that the miseries, which he witnesses on every side, may be sanctified to “the inhabitants of the world, that they may learn righteousness.” Yet he cannot but observe, that neither prosperity nor adversity alone will produce this happy effect: for numbers, who hear and profess the gospel, and are conversant with the most honourable

Christians, continue to do wickedly; nay, to envy the people, and hate the holiness, of God. On such, alas! mercies and corrections are alike unavailing: and they close their eyes and hearts against conviction, till his wrath destroy them; and then they see, and are confounded on account of their wickedness and madness. Let us then most earnestly beg of God to sanctify all our trials and comforts, "to prepare our hearts unto himself," and to number us among his chosen people. (Notes, lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19. Ps. x. 17, 18, v. 17.)

V. 12—21.

If the Lord produce in us a penitent, teachable, believing, obedient disposition; he "will ordain peace for us," and cause all to work together for our final good. We all, indeed, have been under the dominion of other lords, and have willingly served them: but the true Christian relies on grace alone, renounces all his former masters, and purposes henceforth to serve the Lord and him only. And he will as surely be made victorious over every one of those evil propensities and habits, which once had dominion over him; and still harass, distress, and alarm him; as the church will triumph over every usurping tyrant, and at length triumphantly rejoice, that they are all extirpated, never more to revive, or give him any further disturbance. But, in this life the believer has much trouble from the remaining power of sin, and is often exposed to painful corrections; yet this puts vigour into his prayers, and keeps him a constant supplicant at the throne of grace. Sometimes, however, he is ready to conclude, that all his efforts are vain, and that no deliverance has been, or can be, effected. But let him persevere in watching, prayer, and steady resistance to temptation, though again and again foiled. The power of God will revive his drooping graces, and destroy his strongest enemies: soon death will terminate the conflict, the soul will then join the assembly of just men made perfect; the body shall at length be raised from the dust, no longer corruptible, subject to disease, or contaminated by sin; but spiritual, holy, and glorious, and bearing the image of "the second Adam, the Lord "from heaven." (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 50—58. Phil. iii. 20, 21.)—Thus the church also shall at length be victorious, in her long continued conflict with successive generations of implacable foes; and they will all be overwhelmed with infamy, or sink into oblivion. The prayers of ancient believers have been answered, the church has been very greatly increased, and God has been glorified in enlarging her boundaries to the ends of the earth. Yet even they were sometimes apt to conclude, that their hopes and exertions and prayers were vain. At present the church continues in troubles, through the prevalence of impiety and iniquity: but numbers are pouring out their prayers, under divine rebukes, for more complete deliverance. Let us never fear, lest these travailing pains should produce nothing but wind and confusion, though "the kingdoms of the "earth are" not yet "become the kingdoms of Christ." The hopes of the disciples of old seemed to be buried in the Redeemer's grave: but beyond expectation, he revived, and their hopes revived with him. The same power will perform every remaining promise and prophecy, till death be swallowed up in victory. The grace of our God can soon render this barren wilderness like the garden of Eden: his providence can readily remove every obstruction; and nothing can be impossible to him, whose voice shall at length be heard by all that are in the graves, and they shall come forth to everlasting life, or everlasting damnation. (Note, John v. 28, 29.) Let us then keep close to him, and separate from the world: let us give ourselves unto prayer, and seek our comfort in secret devotion: (Note, Matt. vi. 6:) thus we shall be safe from indignant foes, and may cheerfully expect the blessings promised in the word of God. Thus, even the grave will form a chamber to hide us from the power of the enemy, until the indignation is overpast, and our full redemption come.—But let the ungodly tremble at these words: the Lord is at hand "to punish the inhabitants of the earth for "their iniquity:" he will then detect every secret wickedness; and no heart can conceive the discoveries which shall be made, "when the earth shall disclose her blood, and "shall no more cover her slain." Let then sinners flee from the wrath to come, whilst the Judge is upon the mercy-seat, dispensing pardons: speedily he will remove to his awful judgment-seat, from which he will denounce and execute deserved punishment upon all unbelievers; but especially on those who have shed the blood of his saints and martyrs, from enmity to his holy image and holy religion.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. (Note, xxvi. 20, 21.) 'This chapter treats of the same subject with the two former, 'and describes that happy state of the church, when Satan 'and his agents shall be subdued, the church shall be enlarged and purged from idolatry, and the Jews shall be 'restored: all which are circumstances attending those 'glorious days, which the prophets often foretel shall come 'to pass at or near the end of the world.' Lowth.—In the day, when God shall "come forth from his place, to punish the wicked," and especially the persecutors of his church: he will also inflict vengeance on leviathan. (Notes, Rev. xix. 17—21. xx. 1—3.) Persecuting tyrants, ambitious conquerors and oppressors, and idolatrous empires, are often represented in scripture, under the emblem of destructive animals, especially leviathans and dragons; and preceding deliverances of the church by the destruction of her oppressors may be alluded to. 11. Ps. lxxiv. 13—17. Jer. li. 34—37. Ez. xxix. 2—5.) Yet the punishment of Satan, rather than that of any of his agents, at the crisis before mentioned, seems more immediately predicted. From the repetition of the word “leviathan,” it is probable, that more than one terrible animal was called by that name; (Notes, Job xli. 1—11. Ps. civ. 25, 26;) and the word (לִיָּאָן) rendered “dragon” is translated elsewhere “sea monster.” (Lam. iv. 3.)—Many people and nations are meant by “the sea” and Satan the old dragon gave his power to the beast which the apostle saw rise out of the sea. (Notes, Rev. xii. 3—6. 7—12, v. 9. xiii. 1. 4. xvii. 15—18, v. 15.) This great enemy of God and his church is the most terrible and destructive of creatures. Immense subtlety, malignity, ambition, and power unite in him. He has long fatally deceived all the nations of the earth, except the remnant, “whose names are written in the book of life, of the “Lamb slain from the foundation of the world;” (Rev. xii. 9. Notes, xiii. 8—10, v. 8. 13—17, v. 14;) so that he has dwelt among them and reigned over them as their god and prince: and his chief seat, as spoken of in these prophecies, has long been fixed in that great city, which, one way or other, has always affected to rule over the nations. (Rev. xvii. 18.)—He prophesieth here of the destruction of Satan and his kingdom, under the name of ‘leviathan.’—God will however at length make the sword of his almighty vengeance, which is exceedingly sharp, and great, and strong, to reach unto him. Then the old serpent will be bound and cast into the bottomless pit, his power will cease, all his obstinate servants and adherents will be cut off, and the earth be overspread with truth and righteousness.

Piercing.] “Crossing like a bar.” Marg. Probably the word means nimbly penetrating; as the other word crooked, means winding this or that way. (Job v. 13. Notes, Gen. iii. 1. Ps. cxxv. 4, 5. Prov. ii. 15.)

V. 2—6. (Notes, v. 1. Ps. lxxx. 8—13. Jer. ii. 20, 21. Matt. xxi. 33—39. John xv. 1—8.) When these events begin to take place, let believers “sing unto,” or concerning, the church, “A vineyard of red wine:” that is, of the most valued wine. (Prov. xxiii. 31.) The visible church will not then bear wild grapes, but excellent fruit in abundance. (Notes, v. 2—7.) The Lord will guard it night and day from harm, and “water it every moment,” with the influences of his Spirit. He never was angry with his church, in the same way, that he is with his enemies, and at that period his anger will be turned away from her. (Notes, xi. 11—16. xii. 1—3.) His severest judgments are not intended against the vines, but against thorns and briers; the hypocrites within, and the enemies around the visible church, who set themselves in battle against him. These are fuel for the fire of his vengeance, and he will go through and burn them up together, with the utmost ease. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) But if any one fears this destruction, let him, by faith and prayer, arrest, as it were, the uplifted arm of God; let him “take hold of his “Strength” of Christ, “the Arm of the Lord;” or, the gospel, “the power of God unto salvation;” let him seek forgiveness, reconciliation, and protection; let him thus engage the power of God on his side; and he shall not seek in vain. (Notes, Jer. xxix. 11—14. Ez. xxxvi. 37, 38. Zech. xii. 9—14.)—But, whatever may become of individuals, the nation of “Israel will certainly take root, “and blossom, and bud, and cover the face of the world “with fruit.” Probably, the fall of the papal antichrist, forming a remarkable fulfilment of the prophecies, will be the means of the conversion of Israel; and this event will prepare the way for the universal promulgation of the gospel. Then all nations will be grafted into that olive-tree, of which Abraham, or Israel, was the root, and thus this prophecy will have its exact accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.)—“These ... words are a description of the flourishing state of the Jews after their conversion, which shall “be as new “life from the dead,” as St. Paul expresses it, “Rom. xi. 15, and shall occasion the fulness of the gentiles coming into the church.” Lowth. (Notes, Rom. xi. 11—36.)—What event has yet occurred, which can be in the least thought a fulfilment of this prophecy, in its plain and full meaning?—Bishop Lowth forms these verses into a dialogue, between JEHOVAH and the church; in which he is followed by Mr. Faber: but no less than six alterations of the letters in the text, as it stands in our present Hebrew Bibles, are required by it. I am not competent to say, whether these are made on adequate authority or not; but they are not at all needful.

dreadful, had not been, nor would be, like those with which their oppressors had been visited. Amalek has been utterly destroyed. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, which successively harassed and oppressed Israel, have been subverted, and the conquered people lost among the conquerors. But the Jews still continue a distinct and numerous nation; an unparalleled instance, of a people surviving so many ages all their conquerors. (Notes, Num. xxiii. 9. Deut. xxxii. 26, 27. Jer. xxx. 10, 11.) They are evidently preserved as monuments of the truth of their own scriptures, as well as of the New Testament; and in order to the performance of the ancient prophecies concerning them. So that, after all the massacres which have been made of them, they have not been "slain according to the slaughter of them that slew them." When the Lord sent forth the afflicting stroke on Israel, he did it "in measure," and debated with them under their sufferings: when he caused the rough and chilling east wind to blow, he stayed or moderated it; that is, he would not suffer any national judgment to extirpate them. Nay, their calamities were intended for their reformation; these national punishments in some sense expiated their guilt as a collective body, and they would be made effectual to purge away the pollution of their sins. Thus when the Chaldeans took away the brass of their altar, and burnt the stones, with the temple and city, as it were, to lime; their groves and images were also destroyed, and their idolatry finally abolished. This was the effect of their calamities as graciously over-ruled for the good of survivors; and not the condition of their pardon, as some explain it.—The Lord, however, had determined that Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, should be desolated, and the land be left altogether uncultivated. (Notes, vi. 11, 12. vii. 17—25.) This dispensation would resemble the pruning of a vine; when the worthless branches are either devoured green by the cattle, or gathered up for burning after they are withered. (Notes, vi. 13. Ez. xv. John xv. 1—8.) The wicked Jews would, in immense numbers be devoured by their enemies, and consumed by the fiery indignation of God. For, being wilfully destitute of understanding, (Notes, vi. 9, 10. John iii. 19—21,) and refusing to profit, either by the warnings, judgments, or mercies of God, they would be exposed to the utmost severity of his justice; without any compassion being shewn them, on account of their relation to him, either as his creatures, or as his professed worshippers.—This has been far more awfully verified, in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and in its long continued consequences, than it was by the Babylonish captivity. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 10. Deut. iv. 25—28. xxviii. 49—67. xxxii. 19, 20. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

Debate with it, &c. (8) "In just measure, when thou inflictest the stroke, wilt thou debate with her: with due deliberation, even in the rough tempests, in the day of the east wind." Bp. Lowth.

V. 12, 13. These verses predict the restoration of the Jews after the captivity; and under that typical event, the recovery of Israel from their present dispersions. At Cyrus's proclamation, they, "whose hearts the LORD stirred up," (Note, Ezra i. 1—4,) "from the channel of the river Euphrates, to the river of Egypt," (Note, Gen. xv. 18—21,) that is, from all the different places, in which they were scattered, were gathered one by one, as fruit is beaten off from the tree: (Notes, xvii. 4—9 :) and thus they, who had been in the most abject servitude, in the land of Assyria, or Chaldea, and the poorest of them especially; with many of those of the ten tribes, and some of the outcasts who had taken refuge in Egypt; returned to rebuild the temple, and worship God at Jerusalem.—But the preaching of the gospel seems especially to be intended by the "blowing of the great trumpet." (Notes, xviii. 3. Num. x. 2—10. Zech. ix. 13—17. Matt. xxiv. 29—31.) By this, the Lord will collect the abject and outcast Jews and Israelites, who are lost in their present dispersions, into his church, number them with his accepted worshippers, and probably reinstate them in their own land. (Notes, xi. 11—16. xii. Ez. xx. 33—38. 40—44. Am. ix. 7—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

malice, enmity, and extensive or durable mischievousness: and as “the devil and his angels” will assuredly be tormented for ever in the lake of fire; let none of his servants expect to escape the same doom, if they continue in their sins. (Note, Matt. xxv. 41—46.)—When Satan shall be restrained, and his determined factors cut off, the people of God shall flourish, and believers will abound in joyful songs of praise.—The Lord will always value his true church, on account of the precious plants with which he has stored it, and the precious fruit that it produces to his glory. May our souls, as belonging to it, be continually watered and kept, that we may abound in “the fruits of the Spirit,” in “all goodness, righteousness, and truth!”—The Lord never punishes unreasonably, or excessively, as men do in a fury, or passion: his anger is removed from every believer, and he “waits to be gracious” to all who repent and seek his face. But briars and thorns are as able to resist the devouring fire, as the hypocrite or infidel is to stand in judgment before him, or to out-brave his vengeance. Flight, concealment, or resistance are, in this case, alike unavailing: nor can the sinner escape, but by drawing near to his offended Lord, humbly confessing his sin, and casting himself wholly upon his mercy through Jesus Christ: thus he disarms his resentment, effects a reconciliation, and engages omnipotence on his side.—If we are engrafted into the living Vine, we should expect and pray for that time, when the progeny of Jacob shall again take root in a fruitful soil, and shall “bud, and blossom, and fill the face of the world with fruit.” Indeed we may be said to be bound in gratitude to pray for the conversion of the poor Jews, and to promote it, by kind usage, argument, and earnest persuasion. Through that nation we have received the lively oracles of God; the condition of it, for many ages past, forms the most incontestable proof of their divine original; and the Jews live among us as a continued warning and instruction. (Note, Zech. viii. 20—23.) No people has ever so suffered, and been so preserved: but there is yet a blessing in the root, and their conversion will be as life from the dead to all the nations of the world. (Note, Rom. xi. 11—15.) Then the great trumpet shall every where sound; unnumbered multitudes of perishing sinners shall be gathered to Christ through converting grace, and shall worship God in spirit and in truth—Whilst we expect those happy times, let us recollect, that the Lord does not deal with his professed worshippers, as he does with his avowed enemies. He so moderates every storm of persecution or affliction, that the church shall weather it out.—The trials also of each believer shall be so appointed in wise and faithful measure, and be attended with such instructions, and such a blessing, that they will tend to purge away iniquity and to promote his sanctification. Thus the fruitful branches are made more fruitful, while hypocrites are broken off and cast into the fire: and when death shall utterly demolish the poor body, sin shall be finally extirpated from the true Christian, and the body shall at length be raised incorruptible and glorious, to share with the soul eternal holiness and felicity. But “in this world, we must have tribulation:” no man can fence out trouble; and they, whose troubles are not made subservient to sanctification, will find them terminate in eternal misery. At present the Lord is upon a mercy-seat, and they only have understanding, who seize the present opportunity of reconciliation to him: for when he shall remove to his tribunal, he will have no mercy on any of our race, who would not in this life know and consider the day of their visitation; neither will he shew the least favour to them for ever. (Note, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.)

NOTES

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—4. This chapter begins a new subject, principally relating to the Assyrian kings, and the devastations of Israel and Judah by them. Ephraim was the chief of the ten tribes of the kingdom of Israel: the rich valleys allotted to that tribe, were full of fruitful vineyards; Samaria was situated on a hill at the head of them; and its strength and beauty were as a crown and a glory, of which the people were very proud.—There seems also to be an allusion to the garlands of flowers, with which the drunkards used to be crowned and adorned at the revels, in which they were overcome and stupified by wine. (Notes, 7, 8. John iv. 5—9.) Shalmaneser was the “mighty and strong one,” whom the Lord had prepared to cast them down by his hand, like a hail-storm, or an inundation. (Notes, 17—19. viii. 6—8. xxv. 3—5. xxx. 29—32. Matt. vii. 24—27.) “With the hand.” That is with great force, as when an earthen vessel is dashed to pieces

Then their crown of pride, and their drunkards also would be trodden together under feet : their honour and beauty would be as a fading flower, and they would be greedily devoured as the first ripe fig, which being discerned when no other fruit is to be had, is hastily seized and eaten up immediately. (Note, Hos. ix. 9, 10.)—‘ No sooner doth the boccure (the early fig) draw ‘ near to perfection, in the middle, or latter end of June, ‘ than the kermex, or summer-fig, begins to be formed, ‘ though it rarely ripens before August ; about which time ‘ the same tree frequently throws out a third crop, or the ‘ winter-fig, as we may call it. This is usually of a much ‘ longer shape and darker complexion than the kermex, ‘ hanging and ripening upon the tree even after the leaves ‘ are shed : and, provided the winter proves mild and temperate, is gathered as a delicious morsel in the spring.’ Shaw’s Travels, quoted by Bp. Lowth.

V. 5, 6. At the very time, when Israel was finally ruined, Judah had a transient return of prosperity under the government of Hezekiah. (Notes, 2 Kings xvii. xviii. xx.) He trusted in God, and did every thing that was in his power to reform his people. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxix—xxx.) And the Lord of hosts himself was the “ Crown of glory and Diadem of beauty,” to Hezekiah and the residue of believers in Judah : for their sakes, he endued the magistrates and counsellors with the spirit of discernment and equity, and gave courage and conduct to the captains, who led forth their troops out of the gate of Jerusalem, or carried back the war even to the gates of their enemies. (Notes, xi. 2—5. Ps. xc. 13—17. Prov. xviii. 10, 11.)

V. 7, 8. Even in Judah, and after Hezekiah’s reformation, iniquity was very prevalent. The Jews also were addicted to intemperance : and not only the common people, but likewise both the priests and prophets were given up to drunkenness. (Note, Lev. x. 8—11.) This swallowed up their judgment and conscience, so that they taught false doctrines, fell into most atrocious errors, and decreed unrighteousness : (Notes, v. 22, 23. lvi. 10—12. Esth. ii. 1. iii. 12—15. Prov. xxxi. 4—7. Hos. iv. 5—7. Hab. ii. 15—17 :) and through their example, the nation was generally led to wallow in drunkenness, their tables were every were polluted with it, and scarcely any place was clean from it. There was, however, a remnant of another character, and for their sakes the city was spared. —“ Even these have erred through wine.” Bp. Lowth.

V. 9—11. The pious king of Judah, and Isaiah with other prophets were very desirous of instructing the people : but they were so hardened in vice, and so early initiated into it, that there were scarcely any, who would give them a hearing ; except they could teach the infants, that were hanging upon their mother’s breasts, or newly weaned from them. Or, the people were so intent upon their pleasures, that they must be torn from them to receive instruction, as the infant is from the breast. It was necessary in all cases, to use much repetition, to dwell long upon every topick, and to teach the people a little on one occasion, and a little on another, as they were able to bear it ; because of their ignorance and unteachableness. But this disgusted many of them, who seem to have turned the instructions of the prophets into ridicule : and, having caught up some detached expressions, such as these here used, and which have a remarkable alliteration in the original ; they contemptuously mimicked their language and manner, and entertained one another by taking them off. —Therefore the Lord determined to teach them by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, who might indeed stammer out insults and menaces in the Hebrew tongue, but would in other things speak a language which they could not understand : for he would use these strangers to scourge such as refused to hear his word. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49—57. Jer. v. 15—18, v. 15. 1 Cor. xiv. 20—25.) ‘ The ‘ scoffers mentioned below (14) are here introduced as uttering their sententious speeches ; they treat God’s method of dealing with them, and warning them by his prophets with contempt and derision. What, say they, doth he treat us as mere infants just weaned ? doth he teach us as little children, perpetually inculcating the same elementary lessons, the mere rudiments of knowledge ; precept after precept, line after line, here and there, by little and little ? imitating at the same time, and ridiculing (10) the concise prophetic manner. God ... retorts upon them with great severity their own contemptuous mockery ; turning it to a sense quite different from what they intended. V. 12, 13. The prophets had pointed out to the people the true way of finding rest and comfort, amid their enemies and trouble, by trusting and waiting on God; but they did not choose to hearken: (Notes, xxx. 15—17. Jer. vi. 16, 17. Matt. xi. 28—30. xxiii. 37—39 :) and therefore, the constant and frequent instructions, which they treated with contempt, hastened and aggravated their condemnation; inducing them to depart still further from God, till they were broken by their enemies, snared in their own policy, and taken in Satan’s net. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9—11. vi. 9, 10. viii. 11—15. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8.)

V. 14, 15. When the prophets denounced the vengeance of God against the people, they treated it with mockery, and ridicule; especially the scornful rulers of Jerusalem, and the priests and prophets before mentioned. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, 9—11.) They boasted that they were in league with death and hell; (Notes, Job v. 20—23. Hos. ii. 18—20 :) and should be safe, even when the judgments of God deluged the land. (Notes, 17—19. viii. 6—8. Dan. ix. 25—27.) For they had formed such confederacies, and devised such politick schemes, as would secure them: though the prophets called these devices and alliances refuges of lies and falsehood; and though they were grounded in deceit and hypocrisy. Perhaps this may refer to some league, which they were attempting to make with Egypt, to assist them against the Assyrians. (Notes, xxx. 1—7. xxxi. 1—5. Ez. xiii. 5—22.)—‘Our arts of cunning and falsehood will secure us, in the most difficult times. They are not supposed to have said thus much in express terms, but this was their true meaning. xxx. 10.’ Lowth.

V. 16. This gracious promise, introducing the subsequent denunciations of approaching judgments, was well sued to give to the pious remnant an encouraging assurance, that the Assyrians should not prevail against Judah, as they had done against Israel. (Note, vii. 14.) ‘This prophecy cannot belong to any but Christ, to whom it is often applied in the New Testament. But it may import thus much, with respect to the time wherein Isaiah lived; that he should never be disappointed who believes in God, whose dwelling is in Zion; and hath made peculiar promises to the Jewish church and kingdom, which shall eminently be fulfilled at the coming of the Messiah.’ Lowth.—The person and salvation of Christ are, in this remarkable prediction, represented under the figure of “a Foundation,” on which some magnificent structure was about to be erected. For the spiritual temple is built on Christ, his Person, and Mediation; with the whole plan and purpose of God for glorifying his great name, in the salvation of sinners; as well as every human hope of mercy, and future happiness. This “Foundation was laid in Zion,” where the Lord dwelt upon his mercy-seat amidst his chosen people. JEHOVAH himself laid it, according to his eternal counsels, and his predictions from the beginning; by the incarnation of Christ, by carrying him through his work, by exalting him in human nature to the mediatorial throne, and by sending the gospel to the nations. This Foundation is a Stone of such stability and excellency, as to support the immense and glorious edifice, which is to endure to all eternity. It is “a tried Stone,” approved by God, and all his saints and servants. It is “a Corner-stone,” compacting together the whole building: “a precious Corner-stone,” in the sight of the Lord, and of every believer: and a most sure Foundation; so that every one, who in any age or nation believes this testimony, and rests all his hopes and his immortal soul on Christ, shall never be put to flight, or confusion, as one in haste to escape impending danger: for he shall be safe, and know himself safe, and shall “quietly wait the salvation of the LORD.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. ix. 30—33. 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Eph. ii. 19—22. 1 Pet. ii. 4—8.)—The Septuagint render the last clause, “shall not be ashamed;” and it is thus quoted in the New Testament.—‘He that believes shall rest himself contented with this all-sufficient means of his comfort and salvation; and shall not either hasten to look out for other helps, or be ashamed of trusting to this.’ Bp. Hall.

V. 17—19. The judgments, which were coming on the scornful rulers and people of Judah, are here contrasted with the safety and well grounded confidence of every believer, as stated in the preceding verse. For the Lord was about to execute impartial justice on the wicked, according to his strict and holy law; as the builder carries on his work by the line, and the plummet. (Notes, x. 21—23. 2 Kings xxi. 13. Ez. xl. 3. Am. vii. 7—9. Rev. xi. 1, 2.) Then the storm of his indignation would sweep away every false confidence; the presumption of the scornful would end in despair; (Notes, 9—15;) they would be trodden down by the instruments of his vengeance; destruction would march forth against them, and come nearer and nearer, by day and by night; so that the very report of their miseries at a distance would be a vexation and terror, to all who heard of them.—The calamities and alarms occasioned by Sennacherib's invasion, and his gradual approach to besiege Jerusalem, might be a partial accomplishment of these predictions. But neither that event, nor even the Babylonish captivity, nor any of their calamities till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, after their obstinate rejection of Christ, the Corner-stone, fully answers the import of these verses. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. 'A mashal, or proverbial saying; the meaning 'of which is, that they will find all means of defence and 'protection insufficient to secure them, and cover them 'from the evils coming upon them. ... Their beds were 'only mattresses laid on the floor; and the coverlet, a 'sheet, or in the winter a carpet, laid over it, in which 'the person wrapt himself.' Bp. Lowth.—Neither the confederacy of the Jews with Egypt, nor any of their politicks, could defend them against the Assyrians, or Chaldeans: neither their temple, altar, sacrifices, nor Pharisaical righteousness could recommend them to the favour of God, when they rejected Christ: nor could their numbers and fortifications defend them against the Romans, when God forsook them, and became their enemy. (Notes, lviii. 11—13. lix. 3—8. Rom. ix. 30—33. x. 1—4.)—'Two 'proverbial expressions, importing that all worldly comforts are insufficient to cure the maladies they are applied 'to; and that human devices are too short to secure us

'against the hand of Providence, whenever that will find 'us out to punish us. And therefore we ought not to rely 'too much on outward means: much less betake ourselves to evil arts for our security, but commit ourselves 'to God in well doing, as the surest Refuge in the time of 'trouble.' Lowth.

V. 21, 22. (Notes, Josh. x. 10—14, vv. 10. 12.) 'The 'destruction of the Philistines is there compared to a 'breach of waters; (2 Sam. v. 20;) the same resemblance 'which is here used (19). Those extraordinary manifestations of God's power at Perazim and Gibeon, were for 'the deliverance of his people, and the destruction of 'their enemies, but now God will act contrary to his usual 'proceedings of grace and mercy, and employ his power 'in destroying his own people.' Lowth.—Perhaps his most extraordinary interposition, in cutting off the army of Sennacherib, in answer to Hezekiah's faith and prayer, and after the hopes of unbelievers had failed, may be alluded to. But his "strange work," which the Jews took it for granted he never would do, was the rejection of them from being his people, numbering them among his enemies, and rising up for their destruction by the Romans, as he had done against the Canaanites and Philistines, by the hands of Joshua and Israel. (Notes, Hab. i. 5. Acts xiii. 38—41.) The prophet therefore warns the people to "give themselves to scoffing no more," (Bp. Lowth,) lest they should be bound in strong bands, unto the execution of his righteous indignation: for he had certainly "heard "from the LORD of hosts, that he had determined a consumption upon the whole land."—The Babylonish captivity was here predicted, but not that event alone: for the prophets addressed their writings to those of succeeding generations, as well as those to whom they were more immediately sent. (Notes, x. 21—23. Dan. ix. 24—27. Rom. ix. 24—29, vv. 27, 28.)

V. 23—29. The dealings of God with Israel and Judah, and with different descriptions of men, are here illustrated by apt similitudes, to which the prophet demanded their earnest attention. The plowman varies his work as the case requires, not "plowing every day;" he carefully prepares the ground for the seed, and sows it with different

^a Jer. iv. 3. Hos. x. 11, 12. to sow? doth he open and ^a break the clods of his ground?

* Or, the wheat in the principal place, and the barley in the appointed place. 25 When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast * in the principal wheat, and the appointed barley, and the [†] rye in their [‡] place?

[†] Or, spelt. Ex. ix. 31, 32. 26 ^b For ^b his God doth instruct him to discretion; and doth teach him.

[‡] Heb. border. 27 For the fitches are not ^c threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but ^d the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod.

29 This also ^g cometh forth from the LORD of hosts, which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working.

kinds of pulse, or grain, each in its appointed spot, the wheat in the principal place as being most valuable. And when he has gathered in his harvest, he knows how to separate the corn from the straw, and the chaff, according to the methods of the time and place in which he lives; and to the nature of the grain, that he may not injure it, but prepare it for his use. (Notes, xxi. 10. xli. 15, 16. Deut. xxv. 4. Hos. x. 9—11. Am. i. 3—5. Mic. iv. 11—13.) 'Four methods of threshing are here mentioned, by different instruments; the flail, the drag, the wain, and the treading of the cattle. The staff or flail was used for the infirmitia semina, says Hieron. The grain that was too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of frame of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron. It was drawn by horses or oxen over the corn-sheaves spread on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain was much like the former; but had wheels with iron teeth, or edges like a saw. ... This not only forced out the grain, but cut the straw in pieces for fodder for the cattle; for in the eastern countries they have no hay. ... The last method is well known from the law of Moses. Deut. xxv. 4.' Bp. Lowth.—Thus the Lord, who has given man this wisdom and discretion, must himself be wonderful in counsel and excellent in operation. As the season and occasion requires, he threatens, corrects, spares, shews mercy, or executes vengeance. He distinguishes between one character and another, with the greatest exactness; and orders every thing according to the counsel of his own will, and for his own glory: he appoints his various dispensations, for the due correction of his people, and in order to separate them from his enemies, and from their sins: he will take care that no trials shall eventually injure his servants; but he will utterly destroy his enemies, when the proper time arrives.—In working. (29) תועבה Note, Prov. ii. 7.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

All that glory and beauty, of which men are proud, will prove a mere "fading flower:" and that affluence which is considered as a crown and ornament, frequently tempts to excess, and thus disgraces its possessor.—They, who are "overcome by wine," are overcome by Satan; for all drunkards are his slaves, and must sink under the final wrath of God, except they repent.—The Lord will abase all the proud; but they, who pride themselves in wickedness, will be rendered peculiarly contemptible.—When the Lord determines to execute vengeance on the ungodly, he has many and mighty instruments at his command, who readily bear down and destroy all before them. Happy then are they alone, who glory in the Lord of hosts himself! His favour and image, communion with him, and communications from him, suffice to enrich the poorest and to ennoble the meanest; they form "a crown of glory and diadem of beauty," superior to any distinctions and decorations of earthly monarchs and conquerors; and thence his people derive wisdom, strength, and courage, for every service and for every conflict. Thus some are qualified for the ministry, and others for the magistracy; and others to defend their country, or lay down their lives in the cause of God. (Notes, 2 Cor. xii. 7—10. Phil. iv. 10—13.)—Whilst the Sovereign of the world leaves some guilty nations to fill up the measure of their iniquities, and gives them up to ruin; he raises up eminent reformers, and preserves a remnant of believers, in other nations, whose prayers and labours prolong their tranquillity. Yet every attempt to promote true religion has hitherto been attended with unspeakable discouragement. Even under the most scriptural means of grace, multitudes have continued ungodly; and have copied the example of the open enemies of God, rather than that of his most honoured servants. And alas! the nominal ministers of religion have frequently been the ringleaders in impiety and scandalous intemperance: and when they are "swallowed up of wine," no wonder that they wander out of the way, teach false doctrine, stumble in judgment, are blind guides, and go before those to the pit of destruction, whom they have misled by their erroneous teaching, and hardened by their flagitious example. Thus excess and riot become common, till no place is clean from filthiness; men's "ears are turned away from the truth, and are turned unto fables;" and the few who are able and willing to teach the people knowledge, and to cause them to understand doctrine, find them alienated, and entirely unteachable; having the incapacity, levity, and heedlessness of children, without their simplicity. In such circumstances, the most scriptural and rational method of inculcating divine truth, by repeated plain instructions, and particular cautions, warnings, and exhortations, excite disgust: and those who are too much engaged in excess or dissipation, to bestow any pains to understand the word of God, absurdly set up for critics; and censure or ridicule the ablest ministers, who give themselves wholly to their work! To keep themselves in countenance, they watch for something in the language or gestures of the minister, which they can misrepresent and deride; and thus they quiet their consciences in despising the message of God. Such men ripen apace for destruction: the Lord will teach them by other methods; “for judgments are prepared for scorers, and stripes for “the back of fools.” Indeed, evil is before all, who refuse to hearken to the proposals of mercy in the gospel, and to seek the holy rest and consolations, which God has provided for the weary and heavy-laden sinner.—It is very painful for the minister of Christ to reflect, when he is endeavouring to instruct, convince, warn, persuade, alarm, or encourage his hearers; that numbers of them will thence take occasion “to go and fall backward, and be “broken, and snared, and taken.” He must, however, go on, even though scorers be found among rulers, whether in church or state, being satisfied that he speaks according to the word of God.

V. 14—29.

When we declare the vengeance of the Lord against all those who “trust in refuges of lies,” we should expect to hear loud clamours against our bigotry and want of charity; and scornful infidels will divert themselves, and each other, even with the most scriptural denunciations of hell and damnation. They have no fears in that respect, and deride those who have, as men of narrow, weak, and superstitious minds: and they speak and act, as if indeed “they had made a covenant with death, and were at agreement with hell,” and were secured against the vengeance of God; having made those things their refuge, which we are as sure, are lies and falsehoods, as that the Bible is the truth of God. He has laid one Foundation, and no man can lay any other: this is tried, approved, and precious; and “he that believeth shall never be confounded.” But let men contrive and endeavour whatever they please: if they do not build on this Foundation, and be not interested in the incarnate God and Saviour; if his person, character, and offices be not precious to their souls; their hopes will be found delusion and presumption; the storm of death and judgment will “sweep away their refuges of “lies, and overflow their hiding-place;” their “covenant “with death shall be disannulled;” and the execution of the righteous sentence of God, according to his holy law, will be so dreadful, that the very report of it is sometimes, even now, intolerably vexatious to them. For whatever men trust to, for justification, except the righteousness of Christ; or for wisdom, strength, and holiness, except the regenerating and new-creating influences of the Holy Spirit; or for happiness, except the favour of almighty God; will be found “a bed which is shorter, than that a “man can stretch himself on it, and a covering which is “narrower, than that a man can wrap himself in it.” Let sinners then fear becoming mockers, lest they be bound in the strong cords of their own iniquity; for the Lord has unalterably decreed the destruction of all ungodly men, throughout the whole earth.—But men presume because God spares them from day to day: not knowing that he has his method and seasons of operation; and knows how to deal with all his creatures, as may best answer the purposes of his glory. For he, who gives natural wisdom to the husbandman, (as well as spiritual wisdom to the believer,) is himself “wonderful in counsel, and excellent “in working.” He has not yet made all ready for the great day of account: and sinners have not yet filled up the measure of their crimes, nor performed their part in the universal plan of him, “who worketh all things after “the counsel of his own will;” and therefore they are spared. His people are not yet fully purified from their sins, and have not yet sufficiently shewn the power of his grace; and therefore they are kept in tribulation. But “he knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, “and to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be “punished.” (Note, 2 Pet. ii. 4—9.) The visible church is his husbandry, and professed Christians are the corn of his floor, mingled with the straw and chaff: but he knows how to make a separation by means of trials and persecutions; he will so moderate these, that they shall do his people no harm; when their end is answered they shall cease; his “wheat shall be gathered into his garner, but “the chaff shall be burnt with unquenchable fire.” (Note, Matt. iii. 11, 12.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1, 2. ‘The subject of this and the ‘four following chapters is the invasion of Sennacherib; ‘the great distress of the Jews while it continued; their ‘sudden and unexpected deliverance by God’s immediate ‘interposition in their favour; the subsequent prosperous ‘state of the kingdom under Hezekiah; interspersed with ‘severe reproofs, and threats of punishment, for their hypocrisy, stupidity, infidelity, their want of trust in God, ‘and their vain reliance on the assistance of Egypt, and ‘with promises of better times, both immediately to succeed, and to be expected in the future age. ...Though ‘the matter is various, and the transitions sudden, yet the ‘prophet seldom goes far from his subject.’ Bp. Lowth. Jerusalem is here called “Ariel,” which signifies the lion of God: and some think that it refers to the standard of Judah, which is said, though with little probability, to have been a lion; or to Christ the Lion of that tribe, or to the strength of the city. (Notes, Num. ii. 2. Rev. v. 5—7.) But probably, it relates to the altar of burnt-offering, which consumed the sacrifices, as a lion devours his prey. Perhaps the Jews sometimes called the city by this name; and trusted that it would prevail against every assailant, because of the sacrifices there offered. But though David had taken it from the Jebusites, fixed his residence there, and removed the ark of the covenant thither; yet God

denounced a woe against it. And though the people continued from year to year to observe their solemn feasts, and to multiply their sacrifices; yet the Lord would surely distress the city, and fill it with trouble and sorrow; and it should be unto him “as Ariel.” As the altar, flaming with the sacred fire, consuming the oblations, and surrounded with the blood and carcasses of the sacrifices, was a typical display of divine justice in the punishment of sin; so should Jerusalem be filled with slain men, and consumed with fire by the avenging justice of God.—This will not allow us to interpret the chapter exclusively of Sennacherib’s invasion. He distressed Jerusalem, but did not render the city like the altar of burnt-offering. “It shall be unto me as the hearth of the great altar.”—Some suppose it’ (the name Ariel) ‘to be taken from the hearth of the great altar of burnt-offerings, which Ezekiel plainly calls by the same name; and that Jerusalem is here considered as the seat of the fire of God, אור אל, which should issue from thence to consume his enemies; comp. xxxi. 9.’ ... Ironically, ‘Go on year after year, keep your solemn feasts; yet know that God will punish you for your hypocritical worship. ... Probably delivered at the time of some great feast when they were thus employed. ... It shall be ... all on flame, as it was when taken by the Chaldeans; or covered with carcasses and blood, as when taken by the Romans; an intimation of which more distant events, though not immediate subjects of the prophecy, may perhaps be given in this obscure passage.’ Bp. Lowth. (Note, Ez. xliii. 13—17, v. 15.)—‘The city which David besieged, (in which sense the word is taken in the third verse;) implying that the enemy should distress it in the same manner.’ Lowth.

V. 3, 4. Sennacherib sent an army, under Tartan, Rab-saris, and Rabshakeh, against Jerusalem; but no intimation is given that they closely besieged the city: (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 17—25. xix. 8:) and it is expressly said that Sennacherib should not encamp against it. (xxxvii. 33.) Again, when the Assyrian chiefs approached Jerusalem, Hezekiah sent ambassadors to them; yet they made no humiliating submissions, but having heard Rabshakeh’s insulting and blasphemous menaces, they answered him not a word. (xxxvi. 21, 22. Note, 2 Kings xviii. 36, 37.) No doubt numbers of the Jews were extremely dejected, and ready to make any submissions: but the language of these verses seems to imply, that the city should be closely environed, and at length taken, and laid even with the ground: and, in this full meaning, the prophecy had its accomplishment, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans; and afterwards by the Romans.—It is very natural to suppose, that many of the surviving Jews, when thus reduced to extremities, would in the most abject manner beg their lives of the haughty conquerors.—Instead of their former confident and presumptuous language, they would express themselves with the most timid and servile intreaties, and doleful complaints; like those that had familiar spirits, who affected to speak in a feeble, shrill, whining tone, as if from the belly; or as if the voice came up out of the earth, while they lay grovelling on the ground. (Note, viii. 19.)—As one that hath a familiar spirit. (4) נאום . Note, Num. xxi. 10.

V. 5, 6. ‘These verses’ (5—7) ‘contain an admirable description of the destruction of Sennacherib’s army, with a beautiful variety of the most expressive and sublime images: perhaps more adapted to shew the greatness, the suddenness, and horror of that event, than the means and manner by which it was effected. Comp. xxx. 30—33.’ Bp. Lowth. The predictions seem also to relate to all the subsequent calamities of the Jews, till the final ruin of Jerusalem.—Sennacherib’s invasion formed the first fulfilment; and many circumstances, in the plain and full meaning of them, belong to that event: but the prophet might be led to use language, which was afterwards exactly accomplished, but could be understood only in a more general and qualified sense, concerning the distresses occasioned by those invaders.—Sennacherib’s army, composed of various nations, all strangers to God and Israel, terrible for courage and ferocity, and insolent through success, seemed innumerable as the dust: yet they would be driven away as the chaff, and vanquished by a single blow “at an instant, suddenly.” (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 35. Ps. xlv. 6. xlviii. 4—8.)—Their approach to Jerusalem was, however, a visitation from God, and occasioned terror and alarm, like thunders, earthquakes, storms, and tempests, and was destructive as a devouring fire. Or, the Assyrian army may be meant; called “thy strangers” (5); and the sudden and dreadful slaughter of a hundred and eighty-five thousand men at once, by the angel, may be predicted. (Notes, x. 28—34. xvii. 12—14. xxx. 29—33.)—Perhaps there is also an intimation that the Jews, not duly profiting by their deliverance from the Assyrians, would afterwards be destroyed in this manner.—The last siege and taking of Jerusalem was attended by dreadful thunders, earthquakes, &c. (Marg. Ref. i.—Note, Zech. xiv. 4, 5.)—Thou shalt be visited, &c. (6) “From JEHOVAH God of hosts, there shall be a sudden visitation.” Bp. Lowth.

V. 7, 8. The transient joy, sanguine hopes, and speedy ruin of the enemies of the Jews, and of the church, are here represented by a very beautiful simile. A man, who, being hungry or thirsty, falls asleep, and dreams that he is eating or drinking, seems to enjoy much pleasure from the visionary gratification: but it soon vanishes; and, his craving wants and faintness continuing when he awakes, his disappointment aggravates his uneasiness. Thus the multitude of the nations, who, through succeeding generations fight against mount Zion, where the altar, or worship of God, is established, have their enmity gratified by transient successes; and, as it were, dream with pleasure and triumphant exultation of effecting the destruction of the church: but the delusion soon vanishes, and leaves them disappointed and miserable. ‘The Assyrians had swallowed up Jerusalem in their imagination; but God should suddenly disappoint all their hopes, and send them away empty and confounded.’ Lowth. (Note, Ps. lxxiii. 18—22, v. 20.) Not only was Sennacherib’s army at once destroyed, and his sanguine hopes thus frustrated; but the Assyrian, Babylonian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, successively, declined and came to ruin, after they had fought against mount Zion: and thus it must be with every nation and individual, which engages in that unequal contest. (Notes, Zech. xii. 2—5. xiv. 1—3. 12—19.)

V. 9—12. The Jews were here earnestly called on to pause, reflect, be amazed, and cry out as in bitter anguish, on account of the judgments which were coming on the nation. Or ironically, “Take your pleasure and riot.” (*Marg. and Marg. Ref. ) They were, and would be, intoxicated with presumption and false doctrine, and rendered insensible to their danger: and the Lord would make them drink of the cup of his indignation, till they staggered as drunken men. (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, li. 17—23.) Because they despised his word, and rejected his salvation, he had “poured upon them the spirit of deep sleep,” and given them up to judicial blindness; and especially their prophets, rulers, and teachers of every description, were covered with darkness, as if hood-winked: so that the visions or prophecies which were sent them, though plain enough in themselves, were utterly inexplicable to them. (Note, vi. 9, 10. xxviii. 9—11. Mic. iii. 5—7. Acts xxviii. 23—29. 2 Cor. ii. 12—16. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.) Their learned men, when asked to interpret them, being blinded by prejudices and passions, excused themselves on account of the book being sealed: intimating that the predictions were so enveloped in obscurity, that, if there were any meaning in them, it could not be discovered. And the poor alledged their want of learning, as the reason of their contempt and inattention: so that in fact “the oracles of God” became of no use to them. The apostle applies this to the state of the Jews in his days: (Note, Rom. xi. 7—10:) and doubtless it had its principal accomplishment, when the chief priests, scribes, Pharisees, and Jewish nation, rejected and crucified their promised and long expected Messiah, and persecuted his apostles and disciples; and in the state of that nation to this present day; whilst, with the scriptures of the prophets in their hands, and being conversant in the letter of them, the book is so sealed, that neither the learned nor unlearned among them can discern, that they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. —‘Prejudice doth as much hinder the learned from understanding God’s word, as ignorance doth the unlearned.’ Lowth.

V. 13—16. Many of the Jews, through successive ages, adhered to the external worship of God, and thus “hounded him with their lips:” but in general their hearts were alienated from him, through the love of sin and worldly things; and their religion was induced, or regulated, merely by regard to human authority. Thus, in the days of Hezekiah, and their other pious kings, they adhered to the temple-worship and kept their solemn feasts; but when “the precept of man” no longer called them to the sanctuary, they turned from it to idolatry. In the days of Christ, they were very tenacious of their forms:

but by the traditions of the elders they “rendered the commandment of God of none effect;” and almost all their religion consisted in superstition, formality, and hypocrisy. (Note, Matt. xv. 7—9.) The Lord would therefore proceed again to do a marvellous work: he would entirely give up their teachers and counsellors to be infatuated to their ruin; leave Jerusalem to be desolated; and cast off the Jews from being his people. (Notes, 9—12. vi. 9, 10. xxviii. 21, 22. Jer. viii. 8, 9. John ix. 39—41. 1 Cor. i. 17—24.) All schemes to hide their iniquity, or to varnish over their malice under specious pretexts, as if they could impose on God and hide their character from him; all their perversions of his word, to establish their own traditions; and all their opposition to his counsels, to support their own authority and reputation, would be as ineffectual, as if the potter's clay could attempt to disannul, or find fault with, the work of him who wrought it. They could no more resist his will, than the clay could that of the potter: he could as easily defeat their schemes, as the potter alters the shape of the clay. They could no more succeed in their enterprizes, when God rejected them, than the clay could become a vessel by its own energy; or change the shape into which the potter cast it, whether he had formed it a “vessel unto honour or to dishonour.” (Marg. Ref.—Notes, v. 18, 19. xlv. 9—11. Jer. xviii. 1—10. Rom. ix. 19—23. 2 Tim. ii. 20—22.)—“The most refined arts of their deep politicians, shall not avail their authors nor be able to preserve them from God's judgments: and their learnedest men shall lose their judgment and discretion. This threatening was remarkably verified under the gospel, when their crucifying Christ out of fear of the Roman power, brought the Romans upon them: and their learned Rabbies ever since have minded little else, but fabulous stories, and their Cabbalists have vented trifles for profound mysteries.” Lowth.

V. 17—19. These verses seem wholly to relate to the rejection of the Jewish nation, and the calling of the Gentiles. In a little time, Lebanon would become Carmel; the uncultivated forest would be a fruitful field: the Gentile nations would be favoured with the abundant sowing of the good seed of “the word of God,” and yield a plentiful harvest of true converts: at the same time, the field, which had long been tilled and yielded fruit, would be esteemed a forest; that is, the nation of the Jews, would be rejected, and left without the means of grace, to become barren and desert. (Notes, xxiv. 13—16. xxxii. 9—15. xxxv. 1, 2. xlix. 5, 6. lv. 11, 12. lxx. 13—16. Ez. xvii. 22—24. Rom. xi. 16—32.) Then they, who before were deaf to the voice of God, would hear and understand the words of that book, which was sealed up from the unbelieving Jews; (Note, 9—12;) and the poor blind heathens, emerging from their obscurity and darkness, would enjoy the marvellous light of the gospel. (Notes, xxxii. 3—5. xxxv. 5—7. xlii. 13—17. Acts xxvi. 16—18. Eph. v. 8—14.) Perhaps the miracles of Christ and his apostles, might also be alluded to. Then the teachable, the meek, and poor in spirit, and the poor and afflicted of this world, would rejoice more abundantly in the Lord, because of the wretched condition, from which they had been delivered; nay, they would be more joyful, than believing Jews in general had been. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lxi. 1—3. 10, 11. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Phil. iv. 1. 4.)

Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field. (17) “Ere Lebanon become like Carmel.” A Mashal, or proverbial saying, expressing any great revolution of things; and when respecting two subjects, an entire reciprocal change: explained here by some interpreters, I think with great probability, as having its principal view beyond the revolutions then near at hand, to the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles. ... Carmel stands here opposed to Lebanon, and therefore is to be taken as a proper name.” Bp. Lowth.

Who condemn men for speaking the truth, as they often served the prophets, or for so slight a matter as an unwary expression. ... It was the custom for the judges to execute their office at the gates of the city. (Deut. xxi. 19. xxii. 15. Ruth iv. 1. 11.) Lowth.—No doubt this was the case, in the days of Isaiah and at many other times. (Notes, xxviii. 5—15. Am. v. 10—13.) It is however evident, that when our Lord came, the rulers, priests, scribes, and sanhedrim of the Jews, most exactly answered this description. Herod, the king of the Jews, persecuted Christ as soon as he was born: the others despised and derided him; they lay in wait to find some accusation against him; they watched for his words and perverted them, and laid snares for him when he publicly reproved their sins, being determined to condemn him for any word which they could lay hold of; and they turned aside, rejected, and crucified this Just One, on the most frivolous pretences. They behaved in the same manner to his apostles and ministers, and were the chief persecutors of the Christians, till Jerusalem was destroyed: then that terrible enemy came to nought, and was cut off; and this tended to establish Christianity, and to increase the joy of believers.—The words may also be applied to the subversion of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, which tended farther to the promulgation of the gospel. (Notes, Zech. xiv. 1—3. Rev. xii. 1—6.)

V. 22—24. God did not intend to reject all the posterity of Abraham and Jacob, that these his redeemed servants should be, as it were, ashamed and wax pale. The Jews and Israelites, who embraced Christianity, would acknowledge the converted Gentiles, as the work of God’s new creating grace, and as their spiritual children: (Notes, xix. 23—25. xli. 8, 9. lx. 15—22. Rom. xi. 11—15. Gal. iii. 26—29. Eph. ii. 4—10, v. 10 :) and their believing descendants would be excited to trust, honour, and worship the Holy One of Jacob, with greater fervency, for this immense accession to the church. Multitudes even of those Jews, who had erred in spirit, and murmured against Christ, and malignantly opposed his gospel, would come to a better temper, and understand and receive his doctrine: nay, at length, the whole Jewish nation will be converted to Christ, and re-admitted into the church.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

External privileges and distinctions will not exempt from woe, any of those, who are destitute of true godliness. Men may persist in an attendance on wearisome and expensive forms; nay, even on the instituted ordinances of God, and glory in their supposed relation to him; when the whole of their apparent devotion consists of pride and hypocrisy.—When he encamps against the strong-holds of his adversaries, they will soon be brought low. Such, as refuse to humble themselves before him in submission to his righteousness, and obedience to his will, will soon be abased to the most extreme distress: and none are more abject in adversity, than those who are insolent and scornful in prosperity.—The Lord employs wicked men to chastise his people, and to avenge himself on hypocrites; and numbers are ready enough of themselves for such services. But at the same time, he prepares sudden destruction for them also: and his enemies shall be visited with vengeance more tremendous, than earthquakes, thunders, tempests, or conflagrations can suggest to the imagination. All their sanguine expectations and transient joys, will be like a pleasing dream. Speedily will they awake from their soothing delusions; and if these continue till death, they will then lift up their eyes in hell, and not find one drop of water to cool their tongue. Then indeed, “it shall be, as when a hungry man dreameth that he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty: or, as when a thirsty man dreameth that he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite.” (Notes, Luke xii. 15—21. xvi. 22—26.) But the disappointment and misery of those who fight against the Church, and exult in the expectation of destroying it, will be the most aggravated. And every nation, which involves itself in the guilt of persecution, lays the axe to the root of its own peace and prosperity.

V. 9—16.

Pride, ambition, avarice, lust, or any head-strong passion produces a perfect intoxication of the soul; and so do erroneous principles in religion: hence originates the most inconsiderate and infatuated conduct, by which men rush upon their own destruction. This should caution every one not to sin against conviction; not to scoff at divine truth; and not to lean to his own understanding or heart, and so despise the teaching and salvation of God: for thus he is provoked to pour on numbers “the spirit of deep sleep,” or “strong delusion:” then they grope at noon-day, as if it were midnight; and the most learned and sagacious, without excepting high priests, or chief priests, rulers, and teachers, are covered with impenetrable error and ignorance. To such persons the Bible becomes absolutely “a sealed book:” and when the learned find that they cannot understand it, and make it accord to their conjectures, they impute it to its want of correctness; and either wholly reject or neglect it, or pervert it by presumptuous alterations, and unnatural comments: and the unlearned are glad of a sanction to their ignorance and impiety.—Instead of despising the poor Jews, who have long been left in this situation, we ought to look to ourselves, and take warning by their example. And let us remember that the Bible is, in some measure, a sealed book to every man, learned or unlearned, till he begins to study it with child-like simplicity and docility; daily praying that the Lord would "open his understanding, that he may understand the Scriptures," and honestly aiming to practise according to the instructions which he has already received.—Alas! what multitudes in this Christian country fall even below the hypocritical Jews in religion; and their conduct may well excite our grief and wonder! They do not so much as "draw near to God with their mouth, or honour him with their lips:" nay, the authority of laws, or royal proclamations, fails of inducing them to pay a descent respect to the name and the day of God! And, of those who are not openly profane, it is to be feared, that very great numbers are formalists, while sin and the world possess their hearts; and their religion is only a compliance with established customs, and regulated in subserviency to reputation and interest. Yet, let it be observed, that, those wanderings of mind, and that defect of reverence and devotion, which are the believer's grief and burden, are very different from the alienation of heart from God, here so severely reprov'd: for the former consists with sincerity, though it is a lamentable proof of imperfection.—As sinners grow hardened in hypocrisy, impiety, or infidelity, their presumption increases: and hypocrites especially cannot be convinced, that God intends to do so "marvellous a work," as to punish them for their wickedness. The wise and prudent men, of this world, are often strangely infatuated, and fall into practical, and even into speculative atheism; and speak and act, as if they could hide their sins, their intentions, or their true character, from God, or frustrate his counsels. But they will find themselves in his hand, as "clay in the hand of the potter:" and as they can have no fence against his power; so their rebellion against his authority, and contempt of his truth, will tend to the display of his justice in their condemnation. By such conduct many other churches, as well as that of the Jews, have provoked God to bereave them of their advantages; and the blessings of salvation have been communicated to others in their stead.

V. 17—24.

When the Lord teaches, "the deaf hear" his word, and "the blind see out of obscurity." When he comforts, the meek, the poor, and the persecuted, "increase their joy in him;" and that holiness of character in God, which sinners hate and dread, inspires believers, in their happiest hours, with confidence and exultation. When by his power terrible persecutors and presumptuous scorers are cut off, the church enjoys peace. And let such, as "watch for iniquity," and scrutinize the actions of Christians and ministers with malicious severity, in order to find matter of accusation; who wait to catch at some word from their lips, for which they may make them offenders; who lay snares for those, that boldly and honestly reprove sin, without respect of persons; and who revile and persecute the righteous on every trivial occasion: let such men recollect that they copy the example of the scornful Jews, and of those who crucified Christ, persecuted his disciples, and brought upon themselves swift destruction.—But the Lord will replenish his Church, and never suffer any of his redeemed servants to be ashamed, or to wax pale, by witnessing the permanent triumphs of his enemies. Numbers of children are already raised up to Abraham, from among the poor gentiles: (Note, Gal. iii. 26—29:) may we be found of the number, and experience his new creating power! May we see increasing numbers "sanctify the Holy One of Israel," and fear his name! And may those, who now "err in spirit, and murmur against his truth," whether Jews, Gentiles, Mohammedans, or nominal Christians, be brought to understand and learn the true doctrine, till the whole earth be filled with the glory of our God and Saviour!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1. The propensity, of both Judah and Israel, to form alliances with idolaters, and especially with Egypt, being directly contrary to the law, and inconsistent with dependence on God for protection against all enemies, evinced them to be "rebellious children," who acted unsuitably to their relations to God, and in direct disobedience to his commands. (Notes, 6, 7. xxxi. 1—3. Deut. xvii. 16.) Hoshea, king of Israel, made an alliance with So, king of Egypt, which brought ruin on himself and his people; and perhaps this prophecy was delivered about that time: when the princes of Judah also might be consulting together, to make a similar league against the formidable Assyrian power. (Notes, 2 Kings xvii. 1—6. xviii. 20, 21.) Yet there is no proof that Hezekiah actually entered into such an alliance; nor is it probable, that he would in opposition to the word of God by his prophets: indeed, it is likely that this very message by Isaiah prevented the design, which might otherwise have had terrible consequences. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 5, 6. 2 Chr. xxxii. 6—8.) The princes and people, however, seem to have been bent on the measure: and instead of "asking counsel of the LORD," by his high priest, or by a prophet, or regulating their decisions according to his word, or taking refuge under his protection by repentance, faith, and prayer, (which the Spirit of God would have led them to,) they proceeded to add sin to sin, by proposing to form a league with the Egyptians.—The words rendered "cover with a covering," may mean, "pour out a libation," and some explain them of ratifying a covenant with that ceremony: but, as the custom of ratifying covenants with a libation was a religious observance, and among the Gentiles an act of idolatry; it can hardly be supposed, that Hezekiah would comply with it, or that he would have escaped reproof if he had. Perhaps, however, the king of Israel had gone thus far, and many of the Jews were ready even in this sense to "add sin to sin."

V. 2, 3. "Who set forward to go down into Egypt." Bp. Lowth.—Perhaps some ambassadors from Judah had set out on their journey: but Hezekiah, receiving this message from God, and recollecting that he had not consulted him in the measure, recalled them. (Note, Josh. ix. 14, 15.) The people, however, were disposed to put Pharaoh and Egypt in the place of God, by relying on them for protection, and trusting under the shadow of their wings. (Notes, xviii. 1. xx. 5. Jer. xxxvii. 1—10. Ez. xxix. 6, 7.) But this would surely end in confusion and disappointment.

V. 4, 5. Hoshea's ambassadors came to Zoan and Hanes, or Tahpanhes, to attend on the Egyptian monarch, and concluded a treaty with him: but the Egyptians gave him no effectual assistance, and he and all his people were put to shame, for confiding in a nation which could not profit them, but were a reproach to them; for this alliance eventually hastened their ruin. (Marg. Ref.) And thus, the prophet intimated, it would be a reproach and ruin to Judah, if they persisted in copying their example. (Notes, Hos. vii. 11—16. xiv. 1—3.)—Expositors indeed generally take it for granted, that Hezekiah's ambassadors are meant: but Judah is not particularly mentioned; nothing is elsewhere recorded of a treaty actually entered into by Hezekiah with Pharaoh; Hezekiah's character, as "trusting in the LORD more than all before him," seems not to admit of the supposition; and it was very natural to place the example of Hoshea and Israel, with their Egyptian alliance and its consequences, before the Jews, when eager to seek help from the same quarter. The previous steps taken by the princes were sufficient, to give occasion for Sennacherib's taunt on the subject: (Note, 2 Kings xviii. 20, 21:) but Hezekiah's confidence most certainly was placed in God, not in Pharaoh: and though the Egyptians and Ethiopians interrupted the progress of the Assyrians, this does not prove that Hezekiah made and adhered to an alliance with Egypt, in opposition to the warnings of the prophet.

V. 6, 7. "The burden of the beasts of the south" means the loads of treasure, which the Israelites, or Jews, or both, carried on young asses and camels, southward into Egypt, to purchase the assistance of that people. These were sent into "a land of trouble and anguish," in which their ancestors had been greatly oppressed, which was likely to occasion much trouble and anguish to them; or which was itself doomed to endure much trouble and anguish. (Notes, xix. 1—17.) "Through a land of distress and difficulty: whence come forth the lioness, and the fierce lion, the viper, and the fiery flying serpent." The same deserts are described, which the Israelites passed through, when they came out of Egypt." Bp. Lowth. (Deut. viii. 15. Notes, Num. xxi. 6—9. Jer. ii. 6.) Egypt also, no doubt, in many parts of it, abounded with these fierce and poisonous animals.—The people impoverished themselves to obtain the alliance of Egypt, which could not profit them; for every effort of the Egyptians would be in vain. Therefore the prophet proclaimed concerning this, (the projected treaty of Judah with Egypt,) that "their strength was to sit still:" it would be their wisdom and security to drop the design, and to remain quietly at home trusting in the Lord, and only using lawful means for their safety. (Notes, 15—17. Ex. xiv. 13, 14. Lam. iii. 24—30.)—The word, here translated "strength," is Rahab, a name for Egypt: (li. 9. Ps. lxxxvii. 4:) and some think that the prophet meant, that Egypt would sit still; or, that it would be more for her interest so to do. "Wherefore I have called her, Rahab the Inactive." Bp. Lowth.

V. 8—11. This solemn command of God to the prophet, to write what follows in a table to be hung up, and in a book to be preserved to the most remote posterity, implies, that the prophecy related also to future generations, though the Assyrian invasion gave occasion to it. The same spirit of rebellion, hypocrisy, and falsehood, which then possessed the Jews, would increase in after ages; and they would more and more refuse obedience to the law of God. The people used and would use all their influence and authority, to suppress the testimony of those prophets, who “prophesied right things,” reproving their iniquities, alarming their consciences, and disquieting them in their sins: and employ menaces and reproaches, or bribes and blandishments, to induce them to speak unto them “smooth things, and prophesy deceits,” which might feed their pride and presumption, and soothe their consciences into a false peace. Thus they endeavoured to turn the prophets aside from the path of duty; or to deter them from molesting them, whilst they went on in the paths of iniquity. (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 13, 14. 2 Chr. xvi. 7—10. xxv. 14—16. Jer. v. 30, 31. xxvi. 11—19. Am. vii. 10—17. Mic. ii. 6—11.)—They especially attempted to induce them to desist from mentioning JEHOVAH, as “the Holy One of Israel.” Perhaps they objected to the expression, and pretended to be disgusted with the frequent use of it: (Notes, xxviii. 9—15:) but in fact they did not choose to hear of his holy character and commandments, his holy hatred of sin, and his determination to punish it. They desired that “the Holy One of Israel” might cease from before them, and that they might no more be reminded of his awful justice.—If this were the case in the days of Hezekiah, it was much more so previous to the captivity; and most of all before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: for what was all the opposition of the chief priests, rulers, scribes, and nation at large, to the ministry of Christ and his apostles, but an exact fulfilment of this passage, considered as a prediction? (Notes, Acts iv. 13—22. v. 27, 28. 40.)—The time to come. (8) “The latter day.” Marg. and Marg. Ref.

V. 12—14. The prophet again, and immediately, used the language to which the Jews had objected, in denouncing the vengeance of God on the nation. “The prophet is resolved to usher in his reproofs with his preface, “Thus saith the Holy One of Israel,” whatever distaste

‘it might give to men of reprobate minds. (15)’ Lowth. As they despised the word which God had sent him to speak, and resolved to trust in oppression, or deceit and perverseness; i. e. in their own deceitful and perverse devices: so this their iniquity would undermine their safety, and render their state like a high wall, in which breaches are already made, and which bulges out, and at length rushes down at once; and the higher it is, the more dreadful the fall. (Notes, 1 Kings xx. 30. Ps. lxii. 3, 4. Ez. xiii. 10—16. Matt. vii. 24—27.) For the Lord would dash in pieces their civil and ecclesiastical constitution, like a potter’s vessel, of which no sherd remains, with which fire could be taken from the hearth, or water from the pit.—Jerusalem and Judah were not thus dashed in pieces by the Assyrian invasion; nay, the Babylonish captivity was but a partial fulfilment of the prediction: but when the Jews had despised the word of the gospel, the Lord by the Romans irreparably dashed their state to pieces, and thus it continues to this present day. (Notes, Ps. ii. 7—12. Matt. xxi. 40—44.)

V. 15—17. Notwithstanding the heinousness of their sins, and the power of their enemies, the Lord had assured the Jews, that in returning to him in true repentance and conversion, and adhering to him and his worship, and quietly confiding in his protection, they should be preserved: or, the ambassadors may be addressed, who were called on to return from Egypt, and quietly trust in God, who would protect them without the aid of Pharaoh. It is probable, that Hezekiah and a remnant did so, and for their sakes the city was spared: but many would not take this counsel: they were resolved, if possible, to have swift horses from Egypt, (Note, xxxi. 1—3,) that in case of danger they might flee away: and God declared that they should flee away and be pursued by swift enemies; and be so terrified, that a single assailant should put to flight a thousand of them, and five would suffice to rout their whole army; (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 29—31;) till only here and there one was left as a sort of prodigy, and like a beacon or ensign, placed for a signal on the top of a mountain, or on a high tower.—It may be supposed that Sennacherib’s army destroyed numbers of those, who would not wait the event in Jerusalem, but attempted to flee elsewhere for safety.—A beacon. (17) “A mast.” Marg. A mast of a ship erected on the top of a high mountain; perhaps as a landmark to seamen.

V. 18, 19. Notwithstanding these judgments, the Lord intended, and promised, to “wait that he might be gracious” to his people; as one ready to extend mercy to them whenever they applied to him. He would, as it were, deem this the one great end of his being “exalted” as absolute Sovereign, and his chief glory. (Notes, Rom. v. 20, 21. ix. 15-18. Eph. i. 3-8. 15-23. iii. 9-12.) For “the LORD is a God of judgment,” of wisdom, knowledge, and equity, who distinguishes characters, and will by no means involve the righteous in the doom of the wicked; (Note, Deut. xxxii. 4;) and all “who wait for him,” or expect salvation from him, are and will be happy. So that, after the approaching desolations, the people would still be enabled to inhabit Jerusalem, or frequent mount Zion: their mourning would cease; and the Lord would be very gracious to them, in hearing and speedily answering their prayers. (Notes, Jer. xxix. 10-14. xxx. 10-18. xxxi. 10-14.)—When Sennacherib’s army was destroyed, doubtless the people offered solemn sacrifices of praise on mount Zion, for being permitted still to dwell in Jerusalem: their sorrows were then converted into joy, and their prayers into thanksgivings; because the Lord had been very gracious to them. (Note, Nah. i. 15.)—From this verse to the twenty-seventh, follow many gracious promises of mercy, several of which cannot with any propriety be applied to the succeeding times of king Hezekiah’s reign: therefore we reasonably suppose, that the prophet, taking an hint from those prosperous times which succeeded this great deliverance, was carried on to a view of better days, which might be expected under the flourishing state of the gospel. Lowth.

V. 20, 21. It is here predicted, that in the midst of poverty and affliction, the Lord would afford the people abundance of good instruction, and faithful publick teachers; who should not be removed into corners, by persecuting princes or victorious invaders: so that the people would continually be directed in the right way, and exhorted to walk in it, and cautioned, on every occasion, not to decline from it on the right hand or on the left. (Marg. Ref. e, f. —Note, Am. viii. 11-14.) During the reign of Hezekiah the people had much good instruction: but it could hardly be said, that they had “the bread of adversity, and the water of affliction;” and after his death, persecuting Manasseh soon drove their faithful teachers into corners. But after the captivity the Jews continued long in a very poor and destitute condition: yet the Lord sent them many able teachers, especially those that came up with Ezra, and were trained up under him. (Marg. Ref. —Notes, Neh. viii. ix.) The priests, Levites, and Scribes were then protected in their work; synagogues were every where erected; and the people were more generally instructed from the law and the prophets, than in preceding times. And, though Antiochus Epiphanes, and others, in some degree persecuted them, yet the people were duly instructed. After prophecy had ceased, the publick teaching from the law and the prophets in all their synagogues, continued without interruption till the coming of Christ: and though it became greatly corrupted, by the glosses and traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees; yet it was not utterly without effect. The publick preaching, however, of the word of God has become far more general under the Christian dispensation, and has been in some measure preserved during all the ages, in which the witnesses have prophesied in sackcloth. (Notes, Rev. xi. 1-14.)—‘This may fitly be applied to that plentiful effusion of God’s Spirit, which is promised under the gospel.’ Lowth.—Probably, future events, respecting the nation of Israel, compared with its present state, (Note, Hos. iii. 4, 5.) will more fully clear up this prediction.—When ye turn, &c. (21) ‘When ye are never so little out of the way. Comp. Deut. v. 32. Josh. i. 7. Prov. iv. 27.’ Lowth.

V. 22. Doubtless, the deliverance from the Assyrians was followed by strong expressions of zeal against idolatry; and perhaps the Jews treated the images of gold and silver, and all their costly coverings and ornaments, as a pollution, and cast them away with abhorrence, as afraid of contracting defilement. (Notes, ii. 19-21. Deut. vii. 25, 26.) Yet many Jews even then secretly retained their idols.

and the nation soon relapsed. But after the captivity, they were totally set against gross idolatry. The prevalence of Christianity alienates men likewise from the idols of the heart: and the recall of the Jews into the church shall be followed by the entire cleansing of it from all remains of antichristian idolatry.

V. 23—25. Fertilizing rain to water the ground when sown, and an abundant increase of every valuable production, are here predicted; with large and luxuriant pastures for the cattle, clean provender for such as laboured in plowing the land, and “rivers and streams of water even “on the tops of the high mountains.” (Notes, xli. 17—20. xliii. 14—21. xlv. 1—5. Joel iii. 18—21.) We may suppose, that after the immense slaughter of the Assyrians, when their overgrown power fell to the ground, the land of Judah was favoured with extraordinary fertility: but more sublime and spiritual blessings are evidently predicted. The word of God is the good seed, (Luke viii. 11,) which, being sown in the heart, and watered by the Holy Spirit, springs up in the conversion and sanctification of sinners. When this seed is extensively sown, and abundantly prospered, the increase is “fat and plentiful.” The gospel is “the ministration of the Spirit:” and after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the word of God was preached far more extensively and successfully than ever it had been before: yet to this day an immense proportion of mankind are, in one form or other, servants to sin and Satan; and far happier and more glorious times are evidently foretold.—When a country is well cultivated the cattle may feed in rich, yet not generally in large pastures; (Note, vii. 22—25;) but the emblem aptly denotes the enlargement of the church, as well as the abundant fruitfulness of Christians.—The clean provender for the labouring oxen, and asses, or other cattle employed in husbandry, may imply the suitable provision made for those who “labour in the word and doctrine,” in the predicted season; (Note, 1 Cor. ix. 7—12;) or that they will themselves feed and feast on those truths and consolations, which they preach to others; and that they will be able to separate the pure doctrines of scripture, from every corrupt and worthless mixture.—Rivers and streams of water are not commonly found on the tops of high mountains: but the emblem implies, that abundant means of grace, accompanied by the influences of the Holy Spirit, would be vouchsafed to those places which had been most destitute of them, and where they were least expected; and to every one of them. (Marg. Ref. r.)—The subversion of the Jewish state, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, with the slaughter of immense multitudes of Jews, were connected with the calling of the gentiles, and the extensive propagation of the gospel. The subversion of the pagan Roman empire, and the slaughter made by the northern nations, made way for its further establishment. But the destruction of all antichristian powers, the slaughter of the determined enemies of Christ, and the subversion of Satan’s towers or strong-holds, making way for the universal promulgation of Christianity, can alone fully answer the import of the passage. “This shall be remarkably fulfilled at the time, when there shall be a terrible destruction of God’s enemies, (Rev. xiv. 20. xix. 21,) when the ‘great ones of the earth shall fall, denoted here by high ‘towers; or by towers we may mean the fortifications of ‘the city, which is the mystical Babylon.’ Lowth. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, xxxiv. 2—10. 2 Cor. x. 1—6. Rev. xiv. 14—20. xix. 11—21.)

V. 26. This verse can only be explained as an emblematical prediction of spiritual blessings; and nothing previous to the coming of Christ can well be considered, as in any respect a fulfilment of it. But then the church “fair as the moon,” shining by the reflected beams of “the Sun of righteousness,” began more than ever before to resemble him. “The meridian Sun” shone with sevenfold light, diffusing, more abundantly and extensively, knowledge, holiness, and comfort on mankind. But when at length the church shall be purified from heresy, superstition, and every corruption of whatever kind; when her divisions shall be completely healed, and every part replenished with truth, holiness, and joy: when the Jews shall be converted, the fulness of the gentiles brought in, all persecution terminated, and the great deceiver cast into the bottomless pit: then this prophecy will receive its entire accomplishment; and not before. (Note, Rev. xx. 1—6.)—The millennium, not the heavenly state, seems to be predicted: and especially, the prosperity and honour of Israel, as a nation. God will then “heal the stroke of “the wound,” which he has inflicted on that people. ‘The latter end of Israel shall be more glorious than its ‘beginning.’ Faber. (Notes, xxiv. 23. lx. 15—22. christian powers, in order to the final triumph of the gospel, seems also especially intended.—The Assyrian army draws near to Jerusalem, and the king exults in confidence of wreaking his vengeance on it; while the inhabitants are filled with consternation, or engaged in fervent prayer. Then “the name,” or glorious power, and all the perfections denoted by “the name of the LORD, came “from far,” or unexpectedly, to defend his holy city; “burning with his anger,” against the blasphemous invader; and about to fall on him, with a weight sufficient to crush him. The sentence, which God had denounced, when “his lips were full of indignation,” was suddenly executed, as if “his tongue had been a devouring fire, and “his breath as an overflowing stream” of vengeance, reaching to the neck, destroying the mighty army of invaders, and just suffering its head, or commander, to escape for the present. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, viii. 6—8. xi. 2—5.) Thus the Lord “sifted the nations,” of which Sennacherib’s troops were composed, “with the sieve of vanity,” and so brought them to nothing: and he put “a bridle in “their jaws,” forcibly turning them aside, that they might miss their aim. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 27, 28. 35—37.)—“Since God’s love and hatred does necessarily result from his wisdom, which approves or dislikes things, according as they agree or disagree with his own infinite perfections; it must follow, that although God be not subject to that turbulency and inconstancy, which attend human passions; yet his favour and aversion must be as strong and vigorous, as lasting and permanent, as the highest expressions in scripture, concerning this matter, can be supposed to import.” Lowth.—‘נָחַץ is a van with which they winnow corn; and its use is to cleanse the corn from the chaff and straw: but the van, with which God will winnow the nations, will be the van of emptiness, or perdition; for nothing useful shall remain behind, but all shall come to nothing and perish. In like manner the bridle is designed to guide the horse in the right way; but the bridle, which God will put into the jaws of the people, shall not direct them aright, but shall make them err, and lead them into destruction.’ Kimchi, a Jewish Writer, in Bp. Lowth.

V. 29—32. The Jews were here encouraged to prepare songs of praise, such as they were accustomed to use, in the night preceding their solemn festivals; or when they marched in companies, attended with musick, to the temple: (Note, Ps. xlii. 4, 5:) and they were assured, that they would soon have abundant reason thus to rejoice and praise God. For he would “cause his glorious voice to be “heard,” commanding the slaughter of their enemies; “the power of his arm lighting” upon them would be manifested; and his indignation, like fire, tempest, and hail-stones, would destroy them. (Notes, xxix. 5, 6. Josh. x. 11. 1 Sam. vii. 10, 11. 2 Sam. xxii. 7—16.) Thus the Assyrian, who had smitten the Jews as the Lord’s correcting rod, would be beaten to the earth: and in all those places through which this staff of his indignation, which seemed to be “grounded,” or established, in Providence, was about to pass, and cause great distress to the Jews; there its destruction would be celebrated with tabrets and pipes. (Notes, x. 5, 6. 24—34.) For God would fight with this enemy “in battles of shaking,” laying hold of him, and powerfully shaking him to pieces. (Note, Job xvi. 6—16, v. 12.)—“The grounded staff,” signifies such a rod, or stroke, as sinks deep, and makes lasting prints or marks in the flesh: and the expression alludes to the rod, with which the Assyrian smote or corrected God’s people (31).’ Lowth.—Bishop Lowth, on the authority of two manuscripts, renders it, “the rod of correction:” but alterations in the text, where versions and manuscripts, with few exceptions, establish the present reading, are very dangerous: and the difference between “grounded” and correction, made by changing one letter for another, which is very much like it, shews how readily the meaning of scripture might be quite explained away by these apparently trivial alterations.—It is probable, that something analogous to this, but immensely more tremendous, will attend the destruction of all antichristian powers; which will form a striking accomplishment of this prophecy to our posterity. (Notes, Rev. xiv. 14—20. xvi. 17—21. xix. 11—21.)

V. 33. Tophet was a valley near Jerusalem, where children were frequently burnt in the fire to Molech.

'the breath of the LORD, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it.

s 27, 28. Gen. xix. 24. Ps. xl. 5, 6. Rev. xiv. 10, 11.

(Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 31—33. xix. 1—13.) It was called also the valley of the son of Hinnom, or Gehenna. 'It is therefore used for a place of punishment by fire; and by our blessed Saviour in the gospel for hell-fire, as the Jews themselves had applied it. ... Here the place, where the Assyrian army was destroyed, is called Tophet by a metonymy; for the Assyrian army was destroyed probably at a greater distance from Jerusalem, and quite on the opposite side of it; for Nob is mentioned as the last station, from which the king of Assyria should threaten Jerusalem. x. 32.' Bp. Lowth. It is also said expressly to be prepared for the king; yet Sennacherib was not slain with his army: though his power and glory then vanished. The certainty and dreadfulness of the destruction, rather than the place of it, seems intended. The large and deep valley, prepared long before for this purpose, supplied with a vast pile of wood and other combustibles, and kindled by the breath of God, as by a stream of burning sulphur, when the blaspheming monarch and his most formidable army were brought down into it; forms an awful emblem of "the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels," and for all the enemies of God: and of the triumph of Christ over him and his party, the king and his subjects. (Notes, Rev. xx. 1, 2. 11—15.) 'I conceive that this expression points at a more hidden sense, couched under this description, which is the final destruction of sinners in that Tophet, or Gehenna, of which the valley of Hinnom was only a faint resemblance, together with Satan their prince at the head of them.' Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

All they, who will not ask and follow the counsel of God, are "children of rebellion;" and so are they, who attempt to secure themselves against impending dangers, without relying on his mercy and protection, and obeying his commandments: nor is there any way of avoiding the dreadful consequences of "adding sin to sin," but by making the Saviour's righteousness our covering, and seeking the sanctification of the Holy Spirit in fervent believing prayer.—But men have always been prone to depend on "an arm of flesh," and to "lean to their own understandings," rather than to ask counsel of God, and trust in him: yet the event continually shews their wisdom to be folly, their strength weakness, and their confidence "a refuge of lies;" and that shame and misery are the consequences of departing from God.—More trouble and expense are almost always bestowed about such things as cannot profit, but must be a reproach to those who adhere to them; than are employed in the service of God: nay, multitudes not only follow the examples of such as have been ruined by their evil courses; but even seek pleasure in those things, which have already caused themselves much trouble and anguish; and expect happiness from those persons who are themselves most miserable!

V. 8—17.

When sinners, having been fairly and repeatedly warned and instructed, refuse to hearken, their guilt becomes peculiarly aggravated; and they should recollect, that all their rebellions are written in a book before God, to be produced against them at the last day.—Hypocrisy is as provoking to God as profaneness; and they who reject and despise the divine law, will derive no advantage from the gospel. Yet a large majority of nominal Christians, and Protestants, nay, zealous professors of evangelical doctrine, prefer soothing instructions! Numbers dislike the holiness of God, and his holy precepts, ordinances, and servants: but they have collected some evangelical notions; they cannot be contented to keep entirely from the preaching of the gospel; and they would prefer such ministers as are of reputation in the church, if they could but induce them to accommodate. They would therefore in part, blind their eyes and stop their mouths, that instead of "right things, they might speak smooth things and "prophesy deceits." But, when neither persuasions nor reproaches can effect this; then they "heap to themselves "teachers" of another kind, and revile and oppose the faithful servants of God. (Note, 2 Tim. iv. 1—5.) For they would induce ministers to leave the direct way of truth and holiness, to walk in crooked paths, and to countenance them, or at least to leave them unmolested, in their iniquities; and to speak little of the justice and holiness of God, but to dwell upon his mercy and grace alone, and the privileges of professed believers indiscriminately; without being particular about duties, precepts, self-deception, hypocrisy, or the wrath to come. But we must not so much as abstain from the use of one expressive scriptural phrase to humour men of this description: we must say, "Thus saith the Holy One of Israel," "whether they will "hear or forbear:" and "if they despise this word," and trust in hypocrisy and iniquity; they must be plainly told, that sudden and inevitable destruction is before them. For those who will not repent and turn to God, welcome his salvation, and seek happiness in his favour and service, should be explicitly and solemnly warned, that there is no other way, and that all their own devices will hasten and aggravate their ruin.

V. 18—22.

The same word, which speaks terror to hypocrites and infidels, gives encouragement to the broken-hearted, earnestly invites sinners to seek the Lord, and ensures the safety of the church. It is not "for us to know the times "or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own "power:" but he assuredly waits his own time of being gracious to his church, and terminating her bondage: and he always waits on his mercy-seat, to be gracious to all who come to him by faith in Jesus Christ. It is his most glorious prerogative to shew mercy; he knows how, when, and on whom, to confer his special favours; and "happy "are they who wait for him." His people, who dwell in his church below, often weep for their sins and sorrows; but they will soon arrive at the Zion above, and then they will weep no more for ever. Even now he is very gracious to them, and ready to hear their fervent prayers, and grant their largest desires: and they would have more comfort, as well as holiness, if they were more instant and constant in prayer.—They, who know the value of spiritual blessings, will be reconciled to “bread of affliction and water of affliction,” should this be their lot; especially if their “teachers be not removed into corners,” and they be favoured with unrestrained access to the publick means of grace. Many of us have the blessing here promised: may we be thankful for it, and duly improve it! and let those who are poor, sick, or in pain, or in any other way kept from the publick means of grace, diligently use such as are yet afforded them; and consolation proportioned to their need shall not be withheld.—They, who drive the ministers of Christ into corners, are answerable for all the heresies and iniquities, which in consequence inundate the church and the world.—But let us remember, that we need the teaching of the Holy Spirit, as well as that of the word of God: and those who simply depend on his promises, and beg to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness, shall, by means of an enlightened understanding, a spiritual taste, and a tender, well-informed conscience, hear, as it were, “a voice behind them, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when they are about to turn to the right hand or to the left.” And this must appear to be no delusion; as they evidently learn to hate the most gainful iniquities, and to renounce every idol and sin with determined abhorrence.

V. 23—33.

All temporal good shall be added to those who first seek heavenly blessings; (Note, Matt. vi. 33, 34;) and who desire, above all other things, that the good seed of the word may be sown and watered in their hearts, and produce a large increase; and whose prayer is, that it may be more and more fat and plenteous, and that they may be enabled to live up to the full enjoyment of their largest privileges. If this be our happiness, let us continue to pray for the accomplishment of these most extensive and glorious predictions; that rivers of gospel-grace may water all the nations, which have hitherto proved inaccessible to it; that the towers of every antichrist, and of Satan, may fall, and his cause on earth be ruined; that the church may shine more resplendent with the glorious light of Christ “the Sun of Righteousness;” that he may shine with inexpressible splendour through all the regions of the earth; and that every breach of his people may be closed, and every wound healed. This approaching period will be as terrible to the enemies of God, as delightful to his people. Then his glorious name, and heavy indignation, and powerful arm executing his threatened vengeance, will suddenly come upon them, as a devouring fire or an overwhelming inundation; will reach them in the most distant regions and closest recesses, and cover them with disappointment, vexation, and anguish; whilst his people shall abound in songs of joyful praise.—Every oppressor, by whom the Lord has corrected his church, will perish like the Assyrian monarch: and every place, that has groaned beneath the rod of persecution, shall be filled with rejoicing. But let sinners of every rank remember, that, persisting in iniquity, they cannot escape the wrath of God. For Tophet is of old ordained for the devil, and his angels and subjects; yea, for ungodly kings and princes, as well as inferior sinners: it is prepared capacious enough to contain all the nations, that forget God; the wicked will themselves be the incombustible fuel of that unquenchable fire; and the wrath of God, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. (Note, Mark ix. 43—50.) Let sinners then flee for refuge to Christ; that they may be safe and happy, when destruction from the Almighty shall sweep away all the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. This chapter coincides with the beginning and conclusion of the preceding one. (Notes, xxx. 1—7. 15—17.) The Israelites had formed a treaty with Egypt, and the Jews were disposed to do the same: but woe to those of either nation, who confided in that people for chariots, horses, and horsemen; by which they were induced to neglect looking to God, and seeking help from him, from enquiring of him, and relying on his power and mercy. “The Lord had commanded the Israelites never to return to Egypt, lest they should forget the benefit of their redemption; and lest they should be corrupted with the superstition and idolatry of the Egyptians, and so forsake God.” (Note, Deut. xvii. 16.) These considerations rendered alliances with Egypt peculiarly criminal: but confidence in men, of whatever nation, is departure from God. (Note, Jer. xvii. 5—8.)

V. 2, 3. The Israelites relied on the wisdom and policy of the Egyptians, as well as on their forces: but ought they not to have remembered, that the Lord also was wise, yea, infinitely superior in wisdom? And having denounced their destruction for iniquity, he would not call back his word, and could easily find means to effect his purpose. For “the Egyptians are man” (Adam) “not God;” they were but feeble, dying, sinful men, and their horses were mere animals: they could not therefore resist him and his "ministering spirits;" but would fall down, and fail, and perish, along with those, whom they vainly endeavoured to assist. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Notes, xx. 2—6. 2 Kings xix. 9—13.)

4 For thus hath the LORD spoken unto me, °Like as the lion and the young lion roaring on his prey, when a multitude of shepherds is called forth against him, he will not be afraid of their voice, nor abase himself for the noise of them: °so shall the LORD of hosts come down to fight for mount Zion, and for the hill thereof.

5 As °birds flying, so will the LORD of hosts defend Jerusalem; °defending also he will deliver it; and °passing over he will preserve it.

V. 4, 5. The Lord himself would undertake to defend Zion against the Assyrians; so that the Jews would not have the least need for help from Egypt. He would no more regard the number or clamour of the Assyrians, than a young lion does the noise of the shepherds, who would drive him from his prey. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, Gen. xlix. 8, 9. Jer. xlix. 19, 20.) And as birds defend their young by hovering over their nests, so would JEHOVAH defend and deliver Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.—Note, x. 12—14.) Notwithstanding the sins of the Jews, he would pass over them, or step between them and the evil that threatened them, and not allow the destroying angel to smite them along with the Assyrians; even as he protected the houses of Israel, when he destroyed the first-born of Egypt. (Notes, Ex. xii. 11—14. 22—30.)

Passing over, &c. (5) "Leaping forward, and rescuing her." The same word is made use of here, which is used upon that occasion; and which gave the name to the feast, which was instituted in commemoration of that deliverance (from Egypt) פסח. ... "JEHOVAH will pass through to smite the Egyptians, and when he seeth the blood on the lentils, and on the two side posts, JEHOVAH will spring forward over (or before) the door ... and will not suffer the destroyer to come into your houses to smite you." Ex. xii. 23. Here are manifestly two agents, with which the notion of passing over is not consistent; for that supposes but one agent: the two agents are the destroying angel passing through to smite every house; and JEHOVAH the Protector, keeping pace with him; and who seeing the door of the Israelite marked with the blood, the token prescribed, leaps forward, throws himself with a sudden motion in the way, ... and covers and protects the house against the destroying angel, and suffers him not to smite it. In this way of considering the action, the beautiful similitude of the bird protecting her young, answers exactly to the application of the deliverance in Egypt; as the mother bird

V. 6, 7. The whole race of Israel had deeply revolted from God, with many and great aggravations. The ten tribes were doomed to destruction: but the Jews, being yet spared, were exhorted to return unto him; and it was also predicted, that their preservation from the Assyrians would be attended with zeal against idolatry, and contempt of the idols which they had made, as an occasion of sin, even those which were formed of silver or gold. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, ii. 19—21. xxx. 22.)

V. 8, 9. The power and army of the Assyrian conqueror fell, neither by the sword of the powerful Egyptian, nor that of the despised Jew, but by a mighty angel. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, 2 Kings xix. 35—37.) Sennacherib fled from that invisible sword, which had destroyed his choicest troops, and made haste to Nineveh his strong hold, or rock; whither divine vengeance pursued him: his princes also, who escaped, were frightened away, because of that ensign which the Lord displayed over Zion. The fire on his altar, consuming the atoning sacrifices, was the protection of his people, and as a furnace to purify them; but it menaced the destruction of all their enemies. (Notes, iv. 3, 4. xxx. 29—32. xxxiii. 10—14. Zech. ii. 1—5. Mal. iii. 1—4. iv. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those possessions, connexions, or dependences, which prevent men from seeking help and happiness from God, will expose them to indignation and woe, as well as disappointment and vexation. Our proneness, to expect assistance or comfort from creatures, shews that we are not duly sensible of their vanity and insufficiency, and of the all-sufficiency of God; and that we do not fully and constantly believe, that he will fulfil both his promises and threatenings. But he will assuredly arise against "the house of evil-doers," and against "the help of those that work iniquity:" and they will all fall together before his outstretched arm. The Lion of the tribe of Judah will appear for the defence of his church, and he will not be abased for the noise of those numbers, who encourage each other against him: but no emblems can fully express his terrible majesty, and his tender mercy, in caring for his people. (Note, Rev. v. 5—7.) Let sinners then take warning by the doom, and not follow the steps, of those who have perished in their sins: let us give him our whole heart and renounce all our idols, and he will abundantly compensate all our losses. But terror and destruction pursue and will overtake all the ungodly; and those dispensations and perfections of God, which ensure the sanctification of believers, will consume all unbelievers as in a furnace of fire. (Note, Heb. xii. 26—29.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1, 2. This chapter seems to be a detached prophecy, delivered at the close of the reign of Ahaz, and referring to the prosperous reign of pious Hezekiah: though some think, that it was delivered about the time of Sennacherib's invasion. Ahaz and his princes had ruled very wickedly, but a king was about to mount the throne, who would "reign in righteousness," employ upright magistrates, and protect the people, both from internal oppression by his equitable administration, and from external invaders by his faith and prayers.—But this interpretation falls immensely short of the unprecedented and most evangelical language employed by the prophet; which cannot possibly be explained in its obvious meaning of any other than Emmanuel, "God manifested in the flesh," without enervating the terms used, in a degree which would, in no other case, be admitted. Christ, our righteous King, and those of his true disciples who exercise authority under him, in church or state, are evidently intended. He alone is the "Man," who shelters sinners from the wrath of God, the temptations of Satan, and the rage of the world; having sustained the storm himself. The consolations and graces of his Spirit are "as rivers of water in this dry land:" and as the over-hanging rock affords the most complete and refreshing shade from the noon-day sun, to the traveller wearied in the sultry desert; so his power, truth, and love, yield the believer the most complete protection and refreshment in this weary land, through which he is travelling to heaven. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16—20. vii. 14. viii. 5—8. ix. 6, 7. xxv. 3—5. xxxv. 6, 7. Ps. lxxii. 1—3. cxlvi. 3—6. Jer. xvii. 5—8.) "The shadow of a great projecting rock is the most refreshing that is possible in a hot country; not only as most perfectly excluding the rays of the sun, but also having in itself a natural coolness, which it reflects and communicates to every thing about it." Bp. Lowth.

1 1 Sam. xxv. 3—8. Prov. xxiii. 6—8.

V. 3, 4. Hezekiah's care to have his people duly instructed would render those, who had any spiritual discernment, clear-sighted: whereas before, they were enveloped in uncertainty, through the prevalence of ignorance and error. The deliverance from the Assyrians would render the people more attentive to instruction, and their minds more capable of receiving it. Even the inconsiderate and imprudent would apply their hearts to understand divine knowledge: and they, who before could scarcely lisp a broken sentence on these subjects, would learn to speak of them fluently and pertinently.—But, the superior knowledge, and spiritual gifts and graces of Christ's kingdom are chiefly intended; and not without reference to his miracles and those of his apostles. "God shall plentifully afford men the light of his truth, and give them grace to make a good use of the instructions he vouchsafes unto them. Those that are weak in faith shall come to more perfect degrees of knowledge. ...The most rude and illiterate, such as could not speak so as to be understood, shall discourse, clearly and intelligibly, of God and of their duty. ...That this promise chiefly relates to the times of the gospel will appear by comparing it with xxix. 18. xxxv. 5. If it be objected that other prophecies foretel the blinding of the Jews under the gospel; we may answer with St. Paul, that "the children of the promise are accounted" for the true seed of Israel. ...The text may be fitly expounded of the conversion of barbarous nations, and their giving praises to God in their several languages." Lowth. (Notes, xxix. 17—19. xxx. 26. xxxv. 5—7.)

V. 5. "There shall be so right a discerning of all things, that virtues shall not pass for vices, nor vices be mistaken for virtues; but men shall be esteemed as they are." Bp. Hall. (Note, v. 20.)—"The fool shall no longer be called honourable." Bp. Lowth. "Nabal shall no more be called Nadib." Such a man as Nabal shall no more be called a prince, or a man of nobility and liberality. (Note, 6—8.) Under wicked monarchs, base men are often preferred, and panegyriized by hireling flatterers; but under wise and pious princes they are disgraced and exposed. This was no doubt the case, in some degree, under good Hezekiah: but the subjects of Christ are taught to form the most accurate estimate of characters and actions, without regard to outward rank or distinction; (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ps. xv. 4;) and the time will come ere long, when this rule will be far more generally adhered to, than hitherto it has been.

V. 6—8. A man of a base and selfish temper will speak such things, as tend to deceive and corrupt others: his thoughts will be employed to contrive the iniquity which his heart desires; and to cover it with hypocrisy, or to excuse it by principles subversive of the divine law, and destructive of piety. Perhaps perjury is meant by “error against the LORD.” (Note, 1 Kings xxi. 8—14.)—Thus, instead of relieving the poor, he will devise ways still further to distress them, either to enrich himself by oppression, or for the pleasure of domineering. When such churls get into authority, they employ instruments, and listen to counsellors, like themselves; and the magistrates delegated by them crush the poor by false pretences, even when they have evident reason and equity on their side. (Notes, i. 21—24. Job xxii. 5—14. xxiv. 2—12. Jer. v. 26—29. Ez. xxii. 12. Am. ii. 6—8. viii. 4—10. Mic. ii. 1—3. 8—10. vi. 10—15. vii. 1—4.) Probably this applied to Ahaz and his princes, as what follows did to Hezekiah and his judges. For Hezekiah being of a liberal and equitable disposition, and influenced by the grace of God, devised liberal things for the relief of the poor, and this tended to his own establishment. (Notes, Job xxix. 12—17. xxxi. 13—23. Ps. cxii. 5, 6.)—But the character of Christ, and of true Christians, and the use which he teaches them to make of authority or wealth, as opposed to the conduct of avaricious oppressors, best illustrate the passage.

The vile person will speak villany. (6) “The fool will still utter folly.” A sort of proverbial expression. Bp. Lowth. (1 Sam. xxiv. 13. xxv. 25. Note, 1 Sam. xxv. 7—17.)

V. 9—14. These verses are commonly interpreted of the troubles which came upon Judah by the Assyrian invasion; yet some do allow that they also refer to the Babylonish captivity, though out of the order of time; and indeed it is plain, that they speak of far more entire and durable desolations, than Sennacherib occasioned. But if we suppose that Hezekiah’s reign was predicted, as typical of the kingdom of Christ; we must naturally conclude, that the consequences of the Jews neglecting to profit by it were also typical of those, which followed from that nation’s rejection of the Redeemer. Thus the transition from the preceding part of the chapter is easy; and we consider these verses as predicting all the troubles of Judah terminating in the Babylonish captivity, and typifying all the miseries of that nation from the days of Christ, till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and their consequent dispersion.—It seems, that the women of Jerusalem, in those days, were peculiarly vain, luxurious, dissipated, and wanton; and regardless of true religion. (Notes, iii. 16—26. Jer. xlv. 15—25.) The prophet therefore especially addressed them, and assured them that many days, and even years, of trouble awaited them: for the provision for their mirth and indulgence would cease; various afflictions would deprive them of their ornaments, and constrain them to gird themselves with the meanest attire; and it would be their wisdom, previously, to gird themselves as penitents with sackcloth, in preparation for the storm, or if possible to avert it. (Note, Deut. xxviii. 43—57.) For they, with the other inhabitants of the city, would have to lament the loss of the milk, corn, and cattle, as well as wine: the whole land would be over-run with thorns and briers; nay, the places devoted to festivity in Jerusalem, now rather a joyous than a holy city, (Note, xxii. 2, 3,) would be thus desolated: yea, the palaces, forts, and towers, being forsaken of their multitude, would for ages become dens for wild beasts, the pleasant abode for wild asses, and a pasture for flocks. (Notes, v. 5, 6. vi. 11, 12. vii. 17—25. xxiv. 1—12.)—The word rendered “they shall lament,” is masculine; and probably refers among other things to the weeping of the infants, when their mothers, pinched by famine, and bowed down with distress, could no longer give them suck.—‘Ophel,’ (the word translated forts) ‘was a part of mount Zion, rising higher than the rest, at the eastern extremity, near to the temple, a little to the south of it. (Mic. iv. 8. Heb.)—It was naturally strong by its situation, and had a wall of its own, by which it was separated from the rest of Zion.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 1—8.

The character, laws, and administration of Christ, our righteous and merciful King, and the blessed effects of them on the state of the world, and upon the conduct and happiness of all his subjects, shew what kings and princes ought to be; and how they should aim, and earnestly exert themselves, to promote the honour of God and the happiness of mankind, by their use of their authority and influence. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. P. O. 1—7. Notes, Ps. xlv. 2—5. P. O. 1—9. Note, Heb. vii. 1—3.) This, if generally attended to, would conduce to a more general and clear discernment of the principles of religion; good instructions would be more regarded; the careless and profligate would be led “to apply their hearts unto wisdom;” the works and word of God would be more generally and plainly discoursed on; characters, and actions, would be ascertained with greater precision; and vice and folly be disgraced, instead of being flattered and caressed. But alas! too commonly, base, foolish, and licentious men push themselves into authority, urged on by restless ambition, and unrestrained by conscientious scruples: nay the expectation or possession of such dangerous pre-eminence too often corrupts those who were otherwise more respectable. 1—12.)—When bad men obtain power, they speak according to the deceit, selfishness, and villany of their hearts; and their wickedness is connected with hypocrisy, impiety, or infidelity, as it best suits their purposes. Nor will they ever want counsellors and agents in iniquity or oppression: and thus the poor labourer, the orphan, or the widow, is grievously injured and defrauded, perhaps under colour of law, though in defiance of truth and justice. (Notes, Ps. xciv. 1—7. 20, 21.) In the mean time, they prepare ruin for themselves; for “He that is higher than the highest of them regardeth it,” and will call them to a strict account.—But wise and disinterested liberal men, who love their poor brethren, for the Lord's sake and after his example; who employ their thoughts in devising, and according to their ability, in executing, plans of liberality, shall be “established for ever;” “and by liberal things shall they stand.” Such are the genuine disciples and subjects of the Lord Jesus, “who reigns in righteousness;” and all they, who use authority as his deputies, will rule in judgment.—But he alone can be our “Hiding-place from the wind, and Covert from the tempest;” he alone can “give him that is athirst of the Fountain of the water of life freely;” he alone can afford us protection and refreshment amidst the unavoidable evils of life, and in the approaching hour of death. To him let the trembling sinner flee for refuge “from the wrath to come:” to him let the tempted or persecuted believer have recourse in every trial: from him let us all seek wisdom, strength, grace, and consolation; keeping close under his shadow, and drinking from his fulness, as we journey forward through this weary land. And, as we trace his steps through the desert, let us remember how he suffered himself, that we might have pardon, peace, security, and strong consolation. Let us also be thankful for our abundant means of knowledge and wisdom, and that he has opened our eyes to behold his glory: and let us still wait on him to enlarge and clear up our views; and to open our ears more and more fully to instruction, that our foolish hearts may understand knowledge, and our stammering tongues may be loosed to speak plainly to his praise.—We ought also to judge of ourselves and others by the rule of his word, to avoid flattery as well as slander, and not “to call evil good, and good evil.” We should seek to have our hearts divested of all selfishness, that our words may be pure, affectionate, sincere, and pious; that we may avoid injustice and oppression, hypocrisy, heresy, and infidelity, with ‘all hardness of heart, and contempt of God's word ‘and commandment:’ and that we may shew whose subjects we are, by liberally communicating to the necessities of our brethren, and doing all the good we possibly can, while we continue in this mournful world.

V. 9—20.

Alas, how many careless ones are there, even among professed Christians, who support excessive self-indulgence by Jews dismayed and distressed, by the ravages and menaces of the invaders; whom God determines to destroy, that all men may know his might, 7—13. The terror of the hypocrites, contrasted with the confidence of believers, 14—16. The happy event of these dangers and terrors; and the security of Zion, under the protection of God, 17—24.

shameful niggardliness! who spend more on their own vanity and luxury in a day, than many large families have to subsist on through the week or month; and who do not contribute to their relief, in any manner of proportion to their other lavish expenses! We should seize on every opportunity of calling loudly on such thoughtless persons, who are “at ease in Zion,” to attend to the word of God: we should declare unto them his “whole counsel,” without respect of rank or sex: we ought, without ceremony, to shew them that misery is before them; except their laughter be turned into godly sorrow, and their carnal joy into humiliation of soul before God, and works meet for repentance. Soon will all their pleasures vanish, and leave them to regret the loss: not only “many days and years will they be troubled,” but to all eternity: not only will all “the houses of joy” through the most populous and joyous cities, be desolated; but “the earth and all its works shall be burnt up.” Nay, none can know what may come upon them even in this life; nor how soon all their pleasures may be turned into anguish of spirit. But they are yet in the land of mercy: and when “the Spirit from on high is poured out” on any soul, or company of people, a glorious change takes place, and “the barren wilderness becomes a fruitful field.” Let us then carefully note the effects of this blessed influence, in the judgment and righteousness produced by it: let us trust in the righteousness of the Redeemer, and copy his example: thus alone can we possess peace in our souls, and permanent assurance; and thus we shall either conciliate our enemies, or God will protect us, and destroy them. And let us pray for the pouring out of this blessed Spirit upon our children and families, upon all the ministers of Christ, and their congregations and neighbourhoods, upon our whole land, the whole visible church, and the whole earth: for until that be vouchsafed, wars and massacres, tyranny and oppression, rebellions, insurrections, and bloody revolutions, profligacy and licentiousness, profaneness or hypocrisy, and other lamented evils will prevail in the world; nor can any effectual method be adopted of very greatly meliorating the state of men in society, or remedying the mischiefs resulting from human depravity; except as the gospel is faithfully “preached, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven,” to render it effectual by his regenerating and new creating power; as on the day of Pentecost in the conversion of three thousand Jews. And whatever either the uninformed yet admired demagogue, or the most sagacious and well informed politician may expect, or teach others to expect; all reformation will prove at best superficial and transient, apart from a new creation of the heart, inducing a new and holy life.—In praying for this blessing, we cannot go beyond the extent of the promises and predictions; and when all Christians shall be excited to abound in such fervent supplications, we may be confident that the glorious period approaches. Happy are they, who “sow the good seed of the kingdom” in places well watered with these sacred influences; where a large increase may surely be expected. We therefore, who are called “to labour in the word and doctrine,” especially should remember, that success as much depends on the fervency of our prayers, as on the faithfulness of our preaching; and far more than it does on our learning, or eloquence, or ingenuity. Let us then pray without ceasing for the blessing; and we shall find that “our labour is not in vain in the Lord.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1. This chapter forms a distinct prophecy, relating chiefly to the Assyrian invasion.—‘And could a translation be made of it, that should come up to the original, it would appear to be as noble a piece of poetry, as is to be found in the most admired writings of the ancients.’ Lowth.—Sennacherib, not having received any provocation, and urged on entirely by rapacity and ambition, had plundered the neighbouring nations; and he had treacherously violated his treaty with Hezekiah, after having taken all his treasures as the price of peace. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 7—17.) But he would soon be deprived of power to spoil or to deceive; and then his camp would be plundered by the Jews; and he would be most treacherously dealt with by his sons, who would murder him in the temple of his idol. (Notes, 23, 24. x. 12—14. 2 Kings xix. 35—37. ‘The prophet addresses himself to Sennacherib, briefly, but strongly and elegantly, expressing the injustice of his ambitious designs, and the sudden disappointment of them.’ Bp. Lowth.)

V. 2. The prophet, for himself and other believers in Judah, interrupted his predictions, by this expressive ejaculation; intimating that prayer would be the most effectual weapon against the Assyrian invader. He intreated the Lord to be gracious to his people, who expected help from him according to his promise; and that he would continually strengthen those who managed their affairs, and thus save the nation in the approaching hour of trouble.—Or the change of person, (“their arm,”) may mean, ‘the arm of all who trust in thee, and wait for thee.’ (Note, Ps. xxv. 2, 3.)—“Every morning,” or speedily, “God shall help her and that right early,” or ‘at the appearing of the morning.’ (Notes, Ps. xlvii. xlviii.)

V. 3, 4. The Lord himself seems here to address the Assyrian king. At the rumour of his tumultuous invasion, and his proud and boasting menaces, the nations whom he attacked were put to flight and scattered. But Hezekiah and his subjects would gather all the spoil of his army, as caterpillars strip plants of their verdure; or as locusts, running to and fro, destroy all the produce of the earth. (Note, Joel ii. 18—20.) This aptly represents the eagerness of the Jews, each for himself, to seize some part of the spoil left in the deserted camp, till the whole was carried off. (Notes, 2 Kings vii. 17—20. 2 Chr. xx. 22—25. Ps. lxviii. 11, 12.)

V. 5, 6. Sennacherib exalted himself, and was for a time very great and prosperous: but JEHOVAH was exalted above him, and above all, upon the lofty throne of his universal kingdom. He had chosen Zion for his earthly residence; and, by prospering Hezekiah’s attempts for reformation, and raising up many to concur with him, he had “filled Zion with judgment and righteousness;” so that, compared with other cities, it was “a holy city.” The wisdom and knowledge, which God had conferred on Hezekiah and his princes, were the stability of those perilous times, and tended more to secure Jerusalem, than the strongest bulwarks: and after Hezekiah had been deprived of his gold and silver, his piety proved a far more valuable treasure, and caused him and his people to be enriched with the spoils of the enemy.

V. 7—9. These verses beautifully describe the terror and distress, which preceded the deliverance of Jerusalem from the Assyrians. Their most valiant captains and soldiers cried out with dismay and deep concern; the ambassadors, who went to solicit peace, wept bitterly at finding the invader inexorable; no one ventured to travel; so that the high ways were like a desert. (Note, Judg. v. 6, 7.) Sennacherib had broken his covenant with Hezekiah, and he despised the feeble opposition made to him by the defended cities, which he ravaged without mercy, regarding no man: and the most populous and fruitful regions resembled what Lebanon would be, if all its cedars were hewn down, and its glory torn from it; and Sharon and Carmel, if made a desert, and their spontaneous productions left to shake without any to gather them. (Notes, x. 7—11. 28—34. 2 Kings xviii. 19—37. xix. 1—4. 23, 24.)

V. 10—13. In this extremity the Lord declared in a most solemn and sublime manner, that he would arise and exalt himself. He would render all the designs and expectations of the invaders abortive; their transient success would only fit them as fuel for the fire, and their own breath, or their blasphemies against him, would kindle the fire, which would burn them as stones are burned to lime, or, thorns to ashes. Thus the event would be so remarkable, that all nations, far and near, might properly, and ought to be, called upon to notice it, as an undeniable proof of the almighty power of Israel's God. (Notes, x. 15—19. xiv. 24—27. xxix. 5—8. 2 Kings xix. 7. 22—37. Dan. iv. 1—3. Nah. i. 7—15.)

V. 14. After all the pious labours of Hezekiah and the prophets and princes, who cordially helped him, there were many profane and hypocritical persons in Jerusalem, who were extremely alarmed with the prospect of impending destruction: and they seem, not only to have dreaded the fire, which they supposed would burn the city and their habitations; but those everlasting burnings, which they had heard of as the punishment of the wicked hereafter.—Or rather, the tremendous slaughter of the Assyrians, in answer to the prayers of the king and the prophet, would make those, who had despised the authority of the one, and the word of the other, fear similar, or even more dreadful vengeance. 'They, that could not bear the thoughts of a mortal enemy falling upon them with all his force; how will they bear the weight of God's wrath, when he shall declare himself their enemy, and set his terror in array against them?' Lowth. (Notes, Matt. x. 27, 28. Mark ix. 43—50.)

V. 15, 16. The prophet seems here to avail himself of the terror of the ungodly Jews, that he might excite them to seek the privileges of the righteous: and he describes the character and the safety of the consistent believer. He habitually acts with integrity, in his whole conduct towards God and his neighbour: his words are sincere, punctual, and faithful: he despises the largest gain of fraud or oppression: instead of grasping the bribe which might be offered him, to induce his connivance at injustice, he shakes his hands from it, and dreads and shuns it as a viper: he stops his ear from every proposal of violence and bloodshed, and closes his eyes from beholding wickedness, as one who detests it. (Hab. i. 13.)—This was the character of Hezekiah in private and publick. This placed him and his helpers on high out of the reach of the invaders, and secured them, as in natural fastnesses and impregnable strong holds; and this preserved them likewise from the famine which had threatened them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Chr. xxxi. 20, 21. Ps. xv. xxiv. 3—6.)

V. 17—19. The pious Jews had deeply grieved to see their king in sackcloth and greatly abased: but they would speedily behold him in his royal robes, and honoured by God and all the people. They were shut up in Jerusalem as in a prison; (Note, 7—9;) but they would soon be allowed to visit the most remote corners of the land, in entire security. And then they would meditate with satisfaction on those events, which had so greatly alarmed them. The officers of the Assyrian monarch, who mustered the troops, dispensed their provisions, raised contributions, or weighed the gold and silver which they had taken, or made observations on the towers of Jerusalem, in order to form the plan of assault, would suddenly disappear and be no more. Or the secretaries, tax-gatherers, and engineers, (as we say,) of Hezekiah, may be intended, who had bestowed much pains to provide against a siege, but would soon appear to have been totally useless; as the Lord had not employed them, but an angel, to destroy the Assyrian army. (Notes, 1 Cor. i. 20-31.) And the Jews would no longer see their fierce enemies, whose very language, not being understood, had rendered them the more formidable and implacable. (Notes, xxviii. 9-11. Deut. xxviii. 49-57. v. 49. Jer. v. 15-18.)—Stammering. (19) “Ridiculous.” Marg.—Notes, 1 Cor. xiv. 6-12. 20-25.

V. 20-22. The city, which God had chosen for the centre of his worship, and in which the Jews had for ages observed all their solemnities, was, it is probable, when this prophecy was delivered, threatened with an immediate siege: but it would soon become “a quiet habitation.” The Assyrians thought they could as easily take and destroy it, as a man removes a tent: but it would not suffer the least injury. For the glorious JEHOVAH, the acknowledged Judge, Law-giver, and King of Israel, would be the almighty Protector of his temple and his worshippers; surrounding them by his powerful presence, as with large rivers and winding streams, into which no galley, or ship of war, belonging to their enemies, should enter. (Notes, Ps. xlv. 4, 5.)—“He shall give Jerusalem protection without danger. In other cities and countries, where they have the commodity of large rivers and inlets from the sea, there may be some peril of advantage to an enemy; but here shall be no such matter.” Bp. Hall.—The security and privileges of the Christian church, especially in those glorious times predicted; and a future period, when Israel and Judah shall be converted, and reinstated in their own land; seem here principally intended: for Jerusalem was never, after Isaiah’s days, long together preserved from hostile invasions, and it has been repeatedly taken down as a tent. (Note, Ez. xlviii. 35.)

V. 23, 24. The mention of gallant ships led the prophet to consider the ruin of the Assyrian army, as a vessel wrecked in a storm. Their tacklings were all driven away, the mast was blown down, and could not be properly strengthened; their efforts were vain, their ruin unavoidable; and, being cast upon the hostile strand, their cargo became plunder for the inhabitants. (Note, Ez. xxvii. 26-36.) On this occasion even the lame would appropriate something of the spoil: and sickness would not prevent the people in general from coming to share the booty. In short God had pardoned the sin of his people, and all blessings were consequent upon it. (Notes, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2. ciii. 3, 4. Matt. ix. 2-8. P. O. 1-8.) This last verse leads our thoughts, not only to the most glorious state of the church on earth; but to heaven itself, whither no sickness or trouble shall find admission. “It is plain, that Hezekiah, by his treaty with Sennacherib, by which he agreed to pay him three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, had stripped himself of his whole treasure: he not only gave him all the silver and gold that was in his own treasury, and in that of the temple, but was even forced to cut off the gold from the doors of the temple, and from the pillars, with which he had himself overlaid them, to satisfy the demands of the king of Assyria: but after the destruction of the Assyrian army, we find that he had “exceeding much riches,” and that he “made himself treasuries for silver and gold, and for precious stones, &c.” (2 Chr. xxxii. 27.) ... This cannot be otherwise accounted for, than by the prodigious spoil that was taken on the destruction of the Assyrian army.” Bp. Lowth. (Notes, 3, 4. 2 Kings xviii. 14-16. 2 Chr. xxxii. 27-29.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13.

Unprovoked rapine and treachery are peculiarly hateful to God, who will punish those that are guilty of them with marked severity.—When the wicked have filled up the measure of their sins, they frequently are spoiled of their treasures, and defrauded to their ruin, by others as wicked as themselves.—They, whose condign punishment is connected with the answer of the prayers of the Lord’s people, are in a most perilous case: for he will graciously defend and uphold all those, who call upon and wait for him, and will be their Salvation in every time of trouble. And, as we have trials and services for every day, we should “every morning” beg of our God to be “our Arm and our Strength.”—The scourges of the world cause great consternation by their tumult and prowess; but at length they fall an easy prey to their enemies. For the Lord is exalted

CHAP. XXXIV.

Predictions of dreadful vengeance, and perpetual desolations, against Idumea and the enemies of the church, 1—15. The certainty of the prophecy, 16, 17.

above all in heaven and earth: it is his glory to abase the proud, and to take care of Zion; and in proportion, as any part of the visible church is replenished by him with truth and holiness, he will delight to watch over it for good. Wisdom, and knowledge, and righteousness, form the stability of our souls, in all persecutions and temptations; and render us stedfast and unmoveable in the ways of God: and true piety is the only treasure, which can never be plundered or spent. The same wisdom, justice, and piety establish the honour and safety of nations; and render the throne of princes in a measure like that of the Lord. Yet even his servants are liable to many fears and distresses; especially when they at all lean to carnal dependences, or cleave to earthly objects. To wean them from these, and to chastise them for their folly, ungodly men are permitted to prosper, and to menace them with dreadful calamities. Then the very champions of the church, and her “ambassadors of peace,” are apt to be dejected and alarmed; as they see the high ways of Zion unfrequented, and all around ready to faint, by reason of the insults of persecutors and infidels, who have no regard either to God or man. But when all other confidences fail the believer, and when the enemies of the church think their victory secure; the Lord himself will arise, and in some unthought of manner, turn the devices of the wicked into confusion, and consume them with the fire of his indignation; that all men may hear, and acknowledge his might, and fear before him.

V. 14—24.

Sinners and hypocrites in Zion have cause to expect more tremendous vengeance, than even avowed enemies: and what fearfulness will surprise them, when they shall at length appear before the tribunal of God! when the Judge shall frown, and denounce sentence against them, and the pit of hell shall open wide to receive them! It behoves all therefore to enquire seriously, who they are, that “shall dwell with everlasting burnings:” and whether we have that genuine godliness, which proves that “Jesus hath delivered us from the wrath to come.” For it is not a tolerable evil to which sinners are exposed, but the everlasting wrath of almighty God: and many, in congregations which are favoured with the best means of grace, will, to their own amazement, sink from under them into these everlasting burnings. “Oh, that men were wise, that they would know these things, and consider their latter end!” For there is a Refuge provided: sinners of all kinds are called upon to flee to it; none are refused admission; and every blessing of salvation is freely bestowed on all, who ask in humble believing prayer. Yet, unless men shew that they have received the atonement and reconciliation, by a life of piety, integrity, sincerity, and superiority to the love of filthy lucre, they must be considered as hypocrites in Zion.—The believer is placed in an honourable and secure station; he is safe in time, and for eternity; and whoever wants, “bread shall be given him, his water shall be sure” He now by faith beholds the King in his glory and beauty, and anticipates the joys of heaven: and ere long his faith shall be changed for vision, his hope for full fruition. He can contemplate with gratitude those awful subjects, which fill the ungodly with terror and dismay; and he needs not fear any of his crafty and subtle enemies, whom he shall shortly see no more for ever.—Our holy city, the church, in which the ordinances of God are administered, though often assaulted by fierce and barbarous foes, will become at length a quiet habitation, and will no longer be exposed to the insults, revilings, or menaces of proud oppressors. And though her humble appearance be despised by them; yet “not one of her stakes shall ever be removed, nor any of her cords broken,” by all the united efforts of earth and hell. But the Lord himself will be her Glory, Beauty, Riches, and Happiness: and every one, who submits to him as King, obeys him as a Lawgiver, and waits for him as a Judge, will surely partake of his complete salvation. For Immanuel reigns over his redeemed people, and as they are become willing subjects, so he is their sure Protector; while all, that refuse to have him to reign over them, will make shipwreck of their souls.—The poorest and feeblest believer will reap immense advantage from the disappointed devices of his enemies. He that blotteth out our transgressions, will heal our souls, and bring us to that land, the blessed inhabitants of which shall no more complain of sickness, pain, or sorrow, for ever. Let us then patiently endure our transient afflictions, and “both hope, and quietly wait the salvation of God.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1. This chapter and the next form one prophecy: and the whole of this is most tremendously descriptive of the greatest carnage and desolation, which can be conceived, or expressed. Some interpreters suppose it to be a general and poetical declaration of God's vengeance upon sinners, at the day of judgment and in the eternal world: and, as it is frequently the case, there are several images peculiarly applicable to those events. (Note, xxiv. 1—12.) But the connexion between these tremendous scenes, and the flourishing state of religion next predicted, as well as many things in the prophecy itself, determines us to another interpretation.—The solemn and repeated call to nations, to the peoples, and to the earth, and the world, and every thing in it, to attend, shews that events of immense importance to all mankind are predicted. (Marg. Ref.)—‘These two chapters make one distinct prophecy; an entire, regular, and beautiful poem, consisting of two parts: the first containing a denunciation of divine vengeance, against the enemies of the people or church of God, the second describing the flourishing state of the church of God, consequent upon the execution of those judgments. ... Among those’ (the enemies) ‘Edom is particularly specified. ... The Edomites were, together with the rest of the neighbouring nations, ravaged and laid waste by Nebuchadnezzar: ... but this ‘event, as far as we have any account of it in history, seems by no means to come up to the terms of the prophecy, or to justify so high-wrought and so terrible a description. And it is not easy to discover what connexion the extremely flourishing state of the church, or people of God, described in the next chapter, could have with those events, and how the former could be the consequence of the latter, as it is there represented to be. ... It seems therefore reasonable to suppose, with many learned expositors, that this prophecy has a further view to events still future, to some great revolutions to be effected in later times, antecedent to that more perfect state of the kingdom of God upon earth, and serving to introduce it, which the holy scriptures warrant us to expect.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 2. All nations.] That is, all nations and their armies, considered as enlisted under the standard of Satan, to war against the church of God. (Marg. Ref.) This ‘may fitly be applied to “the battle of the great day of the “Almighty.” Rev. xvi. 14—16.’ Lowth. ‘God hath determined in his counsel, and hath given sentence for their destruction.’ (Notes, xxx. 27—30. Ps. cxlix. 7—9. Joel iii. 1—17. Zech. xiv. 1—3. 12—15. Rev. xvi. 12—16.)

V. 3—7. The description of vast multitudes slain, and left unburied till they become intolerably offensive; and of human blood shed in such prodigious quantities, as to authorize the strong hyperboles, of the mountains being melted, and the land soaked with it; whilst the dust of the earth is fattened with the fat and flesh of men, suggests most tremendous ideas of these divine judgments: and it impresses the mind with a view of that general and obstinate resistance, which will be made by the nations, at the instigation of Satan, to the setting up of the kingdom of Christ; and of the dreadful judgments, with which that event will at length be ushered in. (Notes, Ez. xxxix. 1—20. Rev. xix. 17—21.) The dissolving of the hosts of heaven, represents the surprising revolutions, which will every where take place, in the constitution of kingdoms and states. (Notes, xiii. 9, 10. Jer. iv. 19—27. Matt. xxiv. 29—31. Rev. vi. 12—17.) The Lord’s “sword bathed in “heaven,” may allude to some method then in use, of burnishing or tempering armour; and it implies, that the vengeance would be executed according to the wise and righteous purposes of God, and with invincible power.—Idumea, or the land of Edom, was a rival and enemy of the Jews: the prediction might have a partial accomplishment, in the desolations occasioned by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Macedonians, and Romans, in which that district was involved. (Notes, xxi. 11, 12. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Ez. xxv. xxxv. Am. i. 11, 12. Ob. Mal. i. 2—5.) But those events had no connexion with that glorious spread of religion next predicted; nor does it appear that they were answerable to such a tremendous description. Idumea may therefore be taken as a general name, denoting the nations inimical to the church, as the Edomites were to the Jews: and for the kingdom of Antichrist in every form.—As “the “people of his curse,” (peculiarly deserving his wrath and exposed to it,) the Lord had devoted them to utter destruction; and would make them a sacrifice at Bozrah, the chief city of Idumea; (Note, lxiii. 1—6;) that is, at the chief residence of Antichrist. The sword of divine justice will then be satisfied with the fatness and blood of the enemies to God; as when lambs, rams, and goats were slain, and their fat was burnt upon the altar. And not only inferior enemies, but unicorns, bullocks, and bulls will thus be sacrificed in abundance; that is, the proudest and mightiest princes of the world, will there be destroyed by the justice and power of God.—‘Edom signifies “red,” ‘as blood is; and “Bozrah,” a vintage, which in the prophetic idiom denotes God’s vengeance upon the wicked.’ lxiii. 3. Joel iii. 13. Rev. xiv. 19, 20. xix. 15. ... The Jewish writers do generally suppose, that Edom, in the writings of the prophets, stands for Rome.’ Lowth.

V. 8. The church has long been oppressed and wasted, by the nations of the earth: but the period approaches, when the controversy between her and her adversaries will be decided; and the Lord will in vengeance recompense them for their injustice and cruelty to his people. (Marg. Ref.)—The injuries also contemptuously done to Israel as a nation shall be avenged. (Notes, Ps. cxxxvii. 7—9. Jer. li. 6, 7. 20—24. 33. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Rev. vi. 9—11)

V. 9—15. These verses relate to the city, where the sacrifice before mentioned (6) was to be made, or at least begun. The language is even more emphatical, than what had been used respecting Babylon, an allowed type of antichristian Rome. (Notes, xiii. 19—22. xiv. 21—23.) And the metaphors are taken from Sodom and Gomorrah: if indeed they be metaphors; but probably they will be literally fulfilled, and Sodom will appear to have been another emblem of that devoted city. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. xix. 24, 25. Deut. xxix. 21—25. Rev. xi. 7—12.) Perhaps subterraneous fire will consume the seat of the papal Antichrist; (indeed plentiful provision is evidently made in that part of the world, for such an event;) and a continual burning and rising up of smoke may perhaps mark out the place on which that city stood, to all future ages; whilst all the rest of the neighbourhood may be entirely desolated, without any inhabitant, or any road by which travellers may pass through it. (Notes, Rev. xiv. 8—11. xviii. 4—8.) For the Lord will measure it with the line of confusion, and the plummet of emptiness; (the words rendered “without form and void,” Notes, Gen. i. 2. 2 Kings xxi. 13:) and that city, whose nobles, or princes, civil or ecclesiastical, have so long lorded it over other nations, shall no more have any one existing in authority. All her tyranny and magnificence shall come to nothing; whilst noxious weeds, thorns, savage beasts, doleful and ravenous birds, and venomous reptiles, shall inhabit the spot, where her proud towers and palaces have stood; and there meet with no disturbance. (Notes, Rev. xviii. 20—24. xix. 1—6.)

They shall call the nobles, &c. (12) ‘The words might more clearly be translated thus; “They shall call,” (or ‘summon,) “their nobles: but there shall be no kingdom “there.” There shall be no sign of any government.’ Lowth.

V. 16, 17. Men in every age are here called on to examine the prophecies, which relate to these and similar events; assured that they will be exactly fulfilled. The Lord will take care, that all the animals above-mentioned shall propagate uninterruptedly, in the place intended. The same Spirit, that inspired the prediction, will take care that it shall be accomplished: and the region, which God himself has allotted them, ‘with the same exactness, as he divided Judea by lot among the children of Israel,’ (Lowth,) shall be their solitary residence to the end of time, to the consummation of all things.

The book, &c. (16) ‘God’s omniscience, whereby all events, past, present, and to come, are represented to him under one single view, is often described in scripture, as if it were in the nature of a register book, where in every occurrence is exactly set down. xxx. 8. lxxv. 6. Deut. xxxii. 34. Ps. lvi. 8. Dan. vii. 10. Mal. iii. 16. Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All people on the earth are concerned to draw near and attend to the word of God; as all must be judged according to it. Because of men’s wickedness, the indignation of the Lord has been on all nations from the beginning, and the history of mankind is little more, than a dismal account, how God has given them up to be slaughtered by each other, till the earth has become “a field of blood,” a great slaughter-house, and burying ground of its inhabitants. In these awful events the Lord executes his own righteous, wise, and deep decrees: and all, who perish by the sword of his anger, are sacrifices to his justice, and he is glorified in their punishment.—In the great vicarious sacrifice of his beloved Son, his justice is indeed fully satisfied, and through him he delights and is glorified in shewing mercy. But “how will they escape who neglect so great salvation?” The day of the Lord’s vengeance and the year of the recompences of Zion, will come shortly: and imagination cannot reach the horrors of that awful season, to those who shall be found opposing the church of Christ. But if temporal judgments may be rendered so tremendous as thus to baffle description, and confound the powers of imagination itself; what will be the general conflagration, the day of judgment, and the unquenchable fire of hell! There, all the ungodly must for ever be expiating, yet never expiate, the guilt of their sins. Let us then daily “seek out of the book of the LORD” and read; and compare all, that we there discover, with the conduct of Providence around us; that we may be more fully convinced of these important truths, and be rendered more earnest and diligent in “seeking first the kingdom of God” and his righteousness.” What the mouth of the Lord has commanded, his Spirit and providence will perform; he will allot every man his portion among those, with whom he is fitted to associate, and in that place which is congenial to his disposition: and they shall all possess their portion for ever and ever.—Let us likewise observe how the evidence of our holy religion is continually accumulating, as one prophecy after another is accomplished: until the full completion of these awful scenes will introduce more happy days; for which we should hope without fainting, and “pray without ceasing,” and exert all our ability and influence to forward and promote.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1, 2. This chapter may have some allusion to the prosperity of Judah, in the days of Hezekiah, at the time when Idumea was ravaged; or to the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity: but without doubt the kingdom of Christ was the grand subject intended by the Holy Spirit.—When the gospel was embraced by the Gentiles, and very great multitudes of spiritual and holy worshippers of God were raised up among them; “the wilderness and solitary place was glad... and the desert rejoiced, and blossomed as the rose.” (Notes, xxii. 15—20. xlii. 10—12. xlix. 9—13. lv. 12, 13.) Yet in immense proportion of the earth is still a desert; and either means of grace, nor spiritual worshippers, nor fruits of holiness, are to be found in it. But when the events predicted in the foregoing chapter shall take place, all these countries likewise shall rejoice “because of them.” (Notes, Rev. xix. 1—8.) The destruction of the antichristian powers will make way for the most rapid and extensive success of the gospel: the benighted Jews and Israelites will be converted; and the gentile world will then blossom abundantly in every part of it, and be filled with joy, and grateful praise to God our Saviour. The glory and excellency of the most favoured and fruitful spots, through all preceding ages, shall be conferred on the most dark and barren regions of the earth: as if the productions of Lebanon, Sharon, and Carmel were transplanted into the parched desert, and made to flourish there. (Notes, Hos. xiv. 4—9. Zeph. iii. 14—20.) For they “shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God,” in the face of Jesus Christ; (Note, 2 Cor. iv. 5, 6:) and shall learn to fear, love, trust, worship, obey, and imitate him, in righteousness, goodness, and truth.

V. 3, 4. The prophet directs the strong in faith, and especially the pastors and teachers, to encourage their weaker brethren, through successive generations, with the prospect of this happy event to all the troubles of the church; that they may not despond on account of what they witness or suffer. (Notes, xl. 1—11. lvii. 14. lxii. 10—12.) By these animating topicks the hands of the weak must be strengthened for the work, the feeble knees confirmed to run the race, and the fearful hearts fortified for the conflict. (Note, Heb. xii. 12, 13.) For though the Lord would permit his enemies to prevail for a time: yet he would come at length to execute vengeance on them according to their deservings, and to save his afflicted people. This might be applied to the first coming of Christ to “destroy the works of the devil;” to his coming, in his providence, to destroy the unbelieving Jews and establish his kingdom, and from age to age to rescue his persecuted servants; and to his final coming to judge the world: but it seems immediately to predict the events, which constituted the subject of the foregoing chapter. (Note, xxxiv. 8.) “This may be applied to Christ, who is God as well as man.” Lowth.

V. 5—7. “The miraculous works wrought by our blessed Saviour are so clearly specified, that we cannot avoid making the application: and our Saviour himself has moreover plainly referred to this very passage. ... Matt. xi. 4, 5. He bids the disciples of John to go, and report to their master, the things which they heard and saw; that “the blind received their sight, the lame walked, and the deaf heard;” and leaves it to him to draw the conclusion, in answer to his enquiry, whether he who performed the very works, which the prophets foretold should be performed by the Messiah, was not indeed the Messiah himself. And where are these works so distinctly marked by any of the prophets, as in this place? And how could they be marked more distinctly? To these the strictly literal interpretation of the prophet’s words directs us. Bp. Lowth.—The miracles of our Lord, here literally predicted, were also emblems of the effect produced by the power of his grace upon the souls of men; when the eyes of the mind are enlightened, the ears that were closed by prejudices are opened to instruction, the helpless sinner is invigorated to walk with joy in the ways of God, and his lips sing and speak praises to his name. (Notes, xxix. 17—19. xxx. 23—25. xxxii. 3, 4. xlii. 13—17. xlix. 5, 6. Matt. xi. 2—6. P. O. 1—6. Acts iii. 1—11. xxvi. 16—18.) The superior knowledge, holiness, and comfort, enjoyed under the gospel-dispensation, and the more abundant conversion of sinners which then took place, are here predicted. ‘According to the allegorical interpretation, they may have a farther view: this part of the prophecy may run parallel with the former, and relate to the future advent of Christ; to the conversion of the Jews, and their restitution to their land; to the extension and purification of the Christian faith, events predicted in scripture, as preparatory to it.’ Bp. Lowth. The calling of the Gentiles was meant, by the waters and streams breaking forth in the desert: when that dry and parched soil was converted into a well-watered country; and the abode of Satan and his worshippers became productive of the pleasant and valuable fruits of righteousness. But when these blessings shall overspread the earth, the accomplishment will be unspeakably more remarkable.

occurs in the Koran. (ch. xxiv.) ‘But as to the unbelievers, their works are like a vapour in a plain, which the thirsty traveller thinketh to be water, until, when he cometh thereto, he findeth it to be nothing.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 8—10. The knowledge of the truth and will of God, and of the way of acceptance and salvation, when made very plain and clear to any people, is like casting up a highway through a country, which was before impassable. (Notes, xi. 11—16. xix. 23—25. xl. 3—5. lvii. 14.) The Gentile world was a desert, in this as well as in other respects; no prepared highway to God and heaven was to be there met with, nor even a more obscure and intricate path of life and salvation. This advantage began to be generally vouchsafed, when the gospel was sent to the nations: yet an immense proportion of the earth is still destitute of it. But it may be said of China, Japan, the interior and unexplored regions of Africa, and every other part of the earth, where Christ has scarcely been named, that “an highway shall be there.” Christ shall be clearly made known; and the way of access and of duty shall be plainly marked out. This authorized way shall be called “the way of holiness,” as it leads to a holy God and a holy heaven, and no unclean, or unconverted sinner, passes over it: but it is appropriated to those, before-mentioned, who have experienced the power of the Saviour’s grace. (Note, 5—7.) These are “way-faring men,” who really desire to walk in this way: and, though they may some of them be men of weak capacities, unlearned, and apt to mistake, they shall be preserved from missing the road.—The words may be rendered, “He himself,” (God,) “shall be with them walking in the way; and the foolish shall not err therein.” Bp. Lowth.—No tempter or persecutor can injure those who walk in it: and at the period chiefly predicted, the great enemy of souls shall be chained up, and the persecutors of the church be cut off; so that none of them shall be found there, even to affright the pilgrims. (Notes, xi. 6—9. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. Hos. ii. 18—20. Rev. xx. 1—3.) Then sinners, ransomed by the blood, and rescued by the power, of their Redeemer the Lord of Hosts, shall return, join themselves to the Lord in his holy ordinances, and go on their way abounding in joy and praise; till they arrive at the heavenly Zion, and have for ever done with sorrow and sighing, and be crowned with everlasting joy

CHAP. XXXVI.

Sennacherib invades Judah, 1—3. He sends a blasphemous message by Rabshakeh, who persuades the Jews to revolt, 4—20. Hezekiah's servants return no answer, but report his words to the king, 21, 22.

NOW ^a it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah, ^b that Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them.

2 And the king of Assyria ^c sent Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem and felicity. (Notes, xxv. 6—8. xxx. 18—21. lxxv. 17—19. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Rev. xix. 1—6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The blessings of “the gospel, preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven,” are of all the most valuable, and conduce the most to our unmingled consolation. While blossoms of heavenly fragrancy are produced in this our land, once a barren desert, may our souls blossom and bring forth fruit abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing! may the peculiar excellency and glory of believers in every age be communicated to us, by the transforming knowledge of the glory and excellency of our God and Saviour! (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.)—Hitherto many real Christians have been weak in faith, and ready to faint amidst their various trials and enemies. But we should take courage ourselves, and endeavour to encourage one another, in the midst of our tribulations; that the joy of the Lord may give strength to our souls, in our work, race, and warfare. (Note, Neh. viii. 10, 11.)—Those who trust in the Lord's mercy, and desire to walk in his ways, ought not to “be of a fearful heart;” for he will not cast them off, or suffer their enemies to prevail against them: they should therefore be strong and cheerful: and pastors and established Christians should exhort and animate their weaker brethren to be “strong in the Lord, and “in the power of his might.” Let the enemies of God and his church have terror for their portion, but let his servants rejoice; for the Lord will shortly come to execute vengeance on the one, and to complete the other's salvation.—That power, which once opened the eyes of the blind, and unstopped the deaf ears, is sufficient to illuminate, humble, and sanctify the most benighted, stout-hearted, and polluted sinner; to make the feeble believer victorious, and to comfort the most dejected. Let us then apply to him thus to renew and rejoice our hearts; and let us supplicate him in behalf of our blinded, hardened, and enslaved relatives and neighbours, and for a world that lieth in wickedness. May the Lord make bare his holy arm, as when the apostles preached his gospel; that all the desert lands may be replenished with “wells of salvation,” and with fruits of righteousness, and favoured with highways to God and holiness, cast up, and cleared from every stumbling-stone!—As this way of holiness is cast up in our land, may we walk in it, and thus approve ourselves to be unto king Hezekiah, with a great army.

And he stood by ^d the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field.

3 Then came forth unto him ^e Elia- kim, Hilkiah's son, which was over the house, and ^f Shebna the scribe, and Joah, Asaph's son, the recorder.

4 And Rabshakeh said unto them, Say ye now to Hezekiah, ^g Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, ^h What confidence is this wherein thou trustest?

5 I say, sayest thou, (but they are the redeemed of the Lord. But no unholy person can find this way however plainly marked out; or however ingenious, learned, or wise he may be in this world. It is only found by “wayfaring men,” who leave the paths of vice and folly, to pursue eternal life and happiness; who seek direction from the word and Spirit of God, and walk by faith in Christ in the paths of holy obedience. These, though esteemed fools by the world, and though they often are of very slender talents, shall be found wise unto eternal salvation. We do not indeed live in those favoured days, when no lion or ravenous beast shall be found in the believer's path; yet even at present every lion is chained, and every traveller divinely protected. Let us then go forward with alacrity, and rejoice in praising our gracious Lord: we shall soon arrive at the heavenly Zion; all our sorrows will flee away, and our everlasting joy and triumph be perfected: for he, who will render his church on earth victorious over every persecutor, will make each believer more than conqueror over every foe, till “death be swallowed up in victory.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1. As many of Isaiah's predictions related to the events here recorded; it was proper that the history contained in this and the following chapters should be inserted: but, as it has before been fully considered, it will not be necessary to add more than a few hints in this place. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 13—36. xix. xx.)—“We may probably conjecture, that this was part of that history of Hezekiah's reign, which Isaiah wrote, as we read 2 Chr. xxxii. 32.” Lowth.

V. 2. Three verses found in Kings, are here omitted. Hezekiah on this first invasion of the land, submitted to the invader, and gave Sennacherib all his treasures as the price of peace: but soon after, probably the next year, Sennacherib sent Rabshakeh, and others with a great army, as here recorded. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 14—18. xx. 1.) It is also added in the parallel passage, that Rabshakeh and his companions “called to the king,” or demanded an audience of him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Shebna.] “This declareth, that there were but few godly to be found in the king's house, when he was driven to send this wicked man in so weighty a matter.” (Notes, xxii. 15—25.)

V. 4—6. Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 19—21. 2 Chr. xxxii.

* Heb. a word of but * vain words,) [†] I have counsel and strength for war: now, on whom dost thou trust, ¹ that thou rebellest against me?

6 Lo, ^k thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust in him.

7 But if thou say to me, ¹ We trust in the LORD our God: ^m is it not he whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and said to Judah and to Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar?

8 Now therefore give [†] pledges, I pray thee, to my master the king of Assyria, ⁿ and I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.

9 How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of ^o the least of my master's servants, ^p and put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and for horsemen?

10 And ^q am I now come up without the LORD against this land to destroy it? The LORD said unto me, Go up against this land, and destroy it.

11 Then said Eliakim and Shebna and Joah unto Rabshakeh, Speak, I pray thee, unto thy servants ^r in the Syrian language; for we understand it: and speak not to us in the Jews' language, in the ears of the people that are on the wall.

12 But Rabshakeh said, Hath my master sent me to thy master and to thee to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit upon the wall ^s that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you?

13 Then Rabshakeh stood, and ^t cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and said, "Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria.

14 Thus saith the king, ^x Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you.

15 Neither let Hezekiah ^y make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us: this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.

16 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, ^z Make an agreement with me by a present, and ¹ come out to me: and ^a eat ye every one of his vine, and every one of his fig-tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern;

17 Until ^b I come and take you away to a land like your own land, ^c a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards.

18 Beware ^d lest Hezekiah persuade you, saying, the LORD will deliver us. ^e Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

19 Where are the gods of ^f Hamath and ^g Arphad; where are the gods of ^h Sepharvaim? ⁱ and have they delivered Samaria out of my hand?

20 Who are they among all the gods of these lands, that have delivered their land out of my hand, ^k that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?

21 But ^l they held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not.

22 Then came ^m Eliakim, the son of Hilkiyah, that was over the household, and Shebna, the scribe, and Joah the son of Asaph, the recorder, to Hezekiah ⁿ with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Hezekiah sends to Isaiah intreating him to pray for the people, 1—5. Isaiah encourages him, 6, 7. Sennacherib, going to meet the Ethiopian king, sends a blasphemous letter to Hezekiah, who spreads it before God with fervent prayer, 7—20. Isaiah describes the arrogant impiety, and predicts the ruin, of Sennacherib, 21—35. An angel slays 185,000 of the Assyrians; and Sennacherib is murdered at Nineveh by two of his own sons, 36—38

AND ^a it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that ^b he rent his clothes, and covered himself with sackcloth, ^c and went into the house of the LORD.

2 And ^d he sent Eliakim, who was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and the elders of the priests, covered with sackcloth, unto Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz.

3 And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, ^e This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and of ^f blasphemy; for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.

the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me.

7 Behold, ^o I will ^p send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour, and return to his own land; and ^q I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.

8 ¶ So ^r Rabshakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria warring against ^s Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed from ^t Lachish.

9 And ^u he heard say concerning Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come forth to make war with thee. And when he heard it, he sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying,

10 Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, ^v Let not thy God, in whom thou trustest, deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria.

11 Behold, ^w thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands by destroying them utterly: and shalt thou be delivered?

12 Have ^x the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as ^y Gozan, and ^z Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of ^a Eden which were in ^b Telassar?

believers on an invisible protection: but their own self-confidence will terminate in shame, when the hope, which rests on the word of God, shall “be found to praise, and “honour, and glory.” The afflicted servant of God will generally find it best to leave ungodly men to revile, boast, insult, and menace, without making any reply: for humiliation, faith, and prayer are our proper employment, in seasons of personal or publick distress. And, however men attempt to discourage or exasperate us, they will not do us any real harm; unless they can prevail with us to neglect or violate the commandments of our Lord and Master.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Tempters and persecutors are effectually subservient to our highest interest, when their endeavours to terrify us, or seduce us from God, make us more simple in our dependence, and more fervent in our prayers: and when they revile us for the Lord's sake, and for our reliance on him, and devoted obedience to him; they engage him on our side, and ensure our victory. Those exploits, in which powerful and wicked men glory, form a counterpart of the conduct of the devil, their father: and when their course is run, some unexpected event sends them to their "own place." But the Lord will defend his church, for his own sake, and that of his anointed King; and those, who fix their hopes and love on him, shall witness the destruction of all their enemies, and triumph in the most complete answer of their largest prayers.

IN those days ^a was Hezekiah sick unto death. ^b And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, ^c Set thine house in order; ^e for thou shalt die, and not live.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1—3. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 1—3.) — One reason of his great concern is supposed to be, because he should leave his kingdom in great distraction, under the terrors of a foreign invasion; and without any heir to take the government upon him: for Manasseh was not born till three years after this. Comp. 2 Kings xx. 6. with xxi. 1. Lowth.—I have walked. &c. (3) Note, 2 Chr. xxxi. 20, 21.

V. 4—6. Notes, 2 Kings xx. 4—6.—I will defend this city.] The other copy, 2 Kings xx. 6. adds, "for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake;" and the sentence seems somewhat abrupt without it. Bp. Lowth. Hence it appears, that Hezekiah's sickness was before the destruction of Sennacherib's army, though it be not mentioned till afterward, because the sacred writer would not interrupt the thread of that story. Lowth.—Certainly this language does not well accord to a remote danger; which a new attack from the Assyrians after the destruction of their army, must have been, if it ever took place.

V. 7, 8. Notes, 2 Kings xx. 8—11. 2 Chr. xxxii. 31.—The sun. (8) It is here expressly said, that "the sun re-turned," and not merely that "the shadow went backward." (Note, Josh. x. 12—14.)

10 I said, 'in the cutting off of my days I shall go to the gates of the grave: I am deprived of the residue of my years.

11 I said "I shall not see the LORD, even the LORD, in the land of the living: I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world.

12 Mine age is departed, and *is removed from me *as a shepherd's tent: I *have cut off like a weaver my life: *he will cut me off *with pining sickness: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

13 I reckoned till morning, that, as a lion, so will he break all my bones: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

14 Like *a crane, or a swallow, so did I chatter; *I did mourn as a dove:

V. 9—13. Hezekiah afterwards recollected and recorded his thoughts during his sickness, both as condemning himself for his despondency, and as magnifying the power of God in his unexpected recovery. (Notes, Ps. cxlii. title. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)—By the premature cutting off of his days before he was forty years old, he was, as he supposed, about to go down to "the gates of the grave," and to be deprived of the residue of those years, in which he had hoped to be very useful to his people. In his attendance on the worship of the Lord at the temple, he had enjoyed many discoveries of his glory, and much experience of his love, which he supposed would now be terminated; and that he was to be excluded from beholding men any more, with the inhabitants of this world. He concluded, that his remaining years of life were departed, as a shepherd's tent is removed: his work was finished, as a weaver's web, when it is cut out of the loom; for the Lord would finish his web of life in the course of a day; that is, he would make it very short: and, by pining sickness, he would soon make an end of him. So that in the evening he reckoned, that by the morning at the furthest, the Lord would terminate his life, as a lion crushes the bones of his prey. (Notes, Job x. 14—17. xvi. 6—16. Dan. vi. 24. Hos. v. 13, 14.)

V. 14, 15. Hezekiah's disease seems to have been very painful; and probably his mind also was discomposed by temptation: so that on recollection, he was conscious he had wanted firmness and patience; his prayers had been intermixed with fretfulness or despondency; and his

17 Behold, 'for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast 'in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption: for 'thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back.

18 For "the grave cannot praise thee; death can not celebrate thee: "they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth.

19 The living, °the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day; 'the father to the children shall make known thy truth.

complaining had been unmeaning, like the chattering of a crane or swallow; and excessive, like the mourning of the dove for its mate. And whilst he looked to the Lord for relief, and it did not come, his eyes were weary, and his faith ready to fail. (Notes, Ps. lxix. 1—3. lxxxiii. 3—12.) But when he was thus bowed down with trouble, and like a debtor who is about to be cast into prison; he still looked to the Lord, to be his Surety, and to "undertake "for him," that he might be set at liberty: nay, at this crisis, he was assured by the prophet that he should recover, and the gracious promise was soon accomplished. He therefore scarcely knew how to express his gratitude, for so unexpected and welcome a deliverance: and he hoped, that he should walk humbly and circumspectly during the rest of his life, recollecting the bitterness of soul from which he had been rescued.—"I will, so long as I "live, remember the bitterness of my life." ... The remembrance of the misery I endured, shall continually 'excite me to renew my thankfulness.' Lowth.

V. 16. 'As all men's lives are thy gift, so I shall always 'acknowledge the preservation of mine to be owing to thy 'goodness in promising, and faithfulness in making good 'thy promise.' Lowth.—By these things the souls of men also are saved: and Hezekiah seems to have meant, that he trusted in the promises and faithfulness of God, for the eternal life of his soul, as well as the continuance of his temporal life.

V. 17—20. Hezekiah had enjoyed much peace, but it was at once turned into extreme bitterness Yet the Lord

out of love to him had spared his life, and delivered his body from “the pit of corruption;” nay, had “cast his sins behind his back,” being determined not to punish him for them. (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 31—34. Mic. vii. 18—20.) For death and the grave terminate man’s opportunities of praising God on earth, and of dependence on his promises. (Notes, Ps. vi. 5, xxx. 6—10. lxxxviii. 10—12.) But the living might thus glorify him, and both spread the knowledge of his truth and will among their contemporaries, and also transmit it down to posterity. (Notes, Gen. xviii. 18, 19. Deut. vi. 6—9, Josh. iv. 20—24. Ps. lxxi. 17, 18. lxxxviii. 3—8.) ‘Thy wonderful mercy towards me shall be recorded to after ages; and fathers shall mention it to their children, as an instance of thy faithfulness.’ Lowth.—Hezekiah purposed without delay to celebrate publicly the praises of the Lord, who had thus shewn his readiness to hear his prayers, and save him from death; and to continue so to do as long as he lived. The animation of the language, “The living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day;” should not pass unnoticed.—Perhaps this hymn was constantly sung in the house of the Lord, during the remainder of Hezekiah’s life. (P. O. 2 Kings xx. 1—11. John v. 1—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Afflictions, and intimations of approaching death, should excite us to serious self-examination and fervent prayer, and remind us to settle all our concerns: and, as the testimony of our conscience, to the simplicity of our faith and obedience, must form one chief support in a dying hour; we should endeavour at all times so to live, that death may not surprise us when this evidence is dubious.—Whatever may be conjectured or inferred from second causes, we shall surely live till our measure of services is accomplished: but it is just cause of regret and humiliation, when sloth or imprudence has induced us to neglect, what we might otherwise have performed.—It is good for us to recollect, and in some cases to record, the circumstances, which relate to the frame of our minds under heavy calamities. The review will supply cause for humiliation and gratitude: we shall commonly find, that our faith, hope, and submission, were greatly alloyed with distrust, dejection, and impatience. Sometimes we inordinately desired life, at others we were sinfully reluctant to live: and when God had corrected us for our good, we have been tempted to conclude that he meant to destroy us. But, if indeed our lives should be prematurely cut off, and we “deprived of the residue of our years,” and no longer allowed to meet the Lord and his saints in his earthly sanctuary: yet, kiah, who shews them all his treasures, 1, 2. Isaiah, hearing it, foretels the Babylonish captivity, and that his descendants would be eunuchs in the king of Babylon’s palace, 3—7. Hezekiah submits to the sentence, 8.

if Christians, we shall remove to a more glorious assembly, behold his glory more fully, and praise him in more exalted strains; even when our bodies “go down to the gates of the grave.” We should always remember, that we now dwell in an earthly tabernacle, which must shortly be taken down: and instead of being anxious to provide for it, or indulge it, we should be seeking “a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens.” (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 1—8.) Let us then daily endeavour to exercise repentance, faith, love, and good works: and then, whether the Lord cut us off by “pining sickness,” or crush us by sudden death, we shall have no cause to complain or mourn.—In tedious suffering our hearts may be ready to fail us, when expecting help from the Lord; and our immense debt of sin, as well as our potent enemies, may alarm us: but our Surety has undertaken for us; and, as he paid our ransom, he will “rescue our souls from the pit of destruction, and cast all our sins behind his back,” and “into the depths of the sea.”—Let us believe his promises, and wait upon him to make them good: let us walk watchfully through our remaining years, remembering the bitter convictions and corrections which sin has occasioned, and the gracious deliverances which the Lord has vouchsafed us. Thus the grace, truth, and power of our God will be “the life of our souls:” after a few more interchanges of peace and bitterness, our sorrows will terminate, and our consolations will be perfected.—But, as we cannot praise God in the grave, let us embrace the present season of serving him among our fellow sinners; hoping in his word, extolling his perfections, blessing him for his mercies, and obeying his precepts. Let us endeavour to make known his righteousness and salvation to all around us, and to those who are to follow us: bringing our children with us to the house of our God, and instructing them from his word; discoursing with them on all his wondrous works, shewing them how ready he is to save and bless those, who call upon him, and leading them to walk with us before him, “in all his ordinances and commandments;” that when we are removed, they may be capable of filling up our places to greater advantage, and hand down to their children, and to posterity, those truths and instructions which they have received from us. (Note, 2 Pet. i. 12—15.)

CHAP. XL.

God commands his prophet and servants to comfort his people, by the assurance that their sins are forgiven, 1, 2. The ministry of John the Baptist foretold, and described, 3—8. The glad tidings of the gospel proclaimed; and the tender care of the good Shepherd, 9—11. A sublime representation of the majesty of God, contrasted with the insignificance and vanity of the human race, as exposing the folly of attempting to liken any to him, 12—26. A gentle rebuke of God's people, for desponding in trouble; and encouraging thoughts suggested to them, 27—31.

COMFORT ye, ^a comfort ye my people, saith your God.

2 Speak ye ^b comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her ^c warfare is accomplished, ^d that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the LORD's hand ^e double for all her sins.

Ionian kings to take their names from the idols which they worshipped. Thus we find one of the kings was called Evil-merodach. 2 Kings xxv. 27.—Nebo was another idol of the Babylonians, ... whence Nebonassar, Nebuchadnezzar, and several other kings of Babylon took their names. ... One reason of sending this embassy was, to satisfy himself about the prodigy of the sun's going backward upon the king's recovery. (2 Chr. xxxii. 31.)—The Babylonians were famous for the study of astronomy, which made their king the more inquisitive about so extraordinary a phenomenon. Lowth. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 8—13. 2 Chr. xxxii. 30—33, v. 31.)

V. 2. Was glad.] In the parallel passage it is said, "he hearkened to them," that is, with too much satisfaction. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxii. 24—29.)

V. 3—8. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 14—19.) 'The king thought it a great favour, that God would delay that punishment which he might have inflicted presently, and prolong the tranquillity of his kingdom for some time.' Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even eminent believers are apt to forget the mercies of God, and to be elated with pride when they ought to be animated in gratitude, and to adoring thanksgivings: (P. O. 2 Chr. xxxii. 24—33. Note, 2 Cor. xii. 1—6. P. O. 1—10.) On some occasions also, they value too highly the friendly notice of ungodly men, in exalted stations. But such coalitions with the world ensure painful consequences; and the Lord will rebuke and correct those whom he loves. Their submission, however, to distressing appointments, shews that grace has regained the ascendancy; and thus truth and peace shall yet be with them through time and to eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1, 2. We now enter upon the latter part of this book, in which the name of the prophet is not mentioned: but it proceeds, as in one continued discourse, is full of consolatory topicks, and treats almost entirely, and most clearly, of Christ and evangelical subjects. The whole seems to have been written after the deliverance of the Jews from the Assyrian invasion, and towards the close of the prophet's life; and the style and imagery are elegant, rich, and often most sublime: so that it cannot be read without great delight, by one that relishes beauties of that kind; even should he be ignorant of the spiritual and prophetick meaning of the sacred writer.—The narration in the preceding chapter, (which perhaps was here inserted, as introductory to these predictions,) had mentioned the Babylonish captivity in express terms: (xxxix. 6, 7:) and the prophet was here employed to prepare comfort for the church in expectation of that affliction, and while groan-

But though some reference is made in many places to the return of the Jews from Babylon; yet the prophet is so carried above all temporal deliverances, in the foresight of the great redemption of Christ and its most glorious effects, that it would often be absurd and vain to seek for any allusion to inferior events, in the language employed by him. 'The course of prophecies, which follow from hence to the end of the book, and which taken together constitute the most elegant part of the sacred writings of the Old Testament; interspersed also with many passages of the highest sublimity; was probably delivered in the latter part of the reign of Hezekiah. The prophet in the foregoing chapter had delivered a very explicit declaration of the impending dissolution of the kingdom, and of the captivity of the royal house of David, and of the people, under the kings of Babylon. As the subject of his subsequent prophecies was to be chiefly of the consolatory kind, he opens them with giving a promise of the Restoration of the kingdom, and the return of the people from that captivity, by the merciful interposition of God in their favour. But the views of the prophet are not confined to this event: as the restoration of the royal family, and of the tribe of Judah, which would otherwise have soon become undistinguished, and have been irrecoverably lost, was necessary in the design and order of Providence, for the fulfilling of God's promises of establishing a more glorious and an everlasting kingdom, under the Messiah to be born of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David; the prophet connects these two events together, and hardly ever treats of the former, without throwing in some intimations of the latter; and sometimes is so fully possessed with the glories of the future more remote kingdom, that he seems to leave the more immediate subject of his commission almost out of the question.' Bp. Lowth.—The command, here given to the prophets and teachers of the church, (the Septuagint insert the words 'O priests,') to comfort the people of God and Jerusalem, with the assurance of the termination of their conflicts in victory and triumph; and of the pardon of their sins, may be considered as an introduction to the whole remaining prophecy, which indisputably extends to the consummation of all things.—The sufferings of Israel and of Judah had abundantly vindicated the honour of the law and justice of God, seeing he thus punished his chosen people for their sins: and the sacrifice of Christ displayed the honour of his holiness and righteous government far more, than even the final condemnation of every transgressor could have done.—As the church of Israel was to be comforted with the assurance of the Messiah's coming; so are Christians to be encouraged with the assurance of the final victory of his cause on earth; and of the church militant, and every member of it, soon becoming triumphant in heaven.—'Any state of servitude or hardship, is compared to a warfare in scripture. 2 Tim. ii. 3, 4. Thus the word is applied to the attendance of the Levites, in the service of the sanctuary. Num. iv. 23. viii. 24. The phrase here alludes likewise to the discharge given to soldiers, after 'so many years' service. Job vii. 1. Lowth.

Double. (2) Notes, lxi. 7—9. Jer. xvi. 18. Dan. ix. 12. Rev. xviii. 4—8.—'That is double in proportion to God's usual severity in punishing men's sins.' Lowth. The temporal punishments of Israel, during their several generations, seem especially meant.

V. 3—5. It is generally supposed, that the prophet here refers to the proclamation of Cyrus, and to the return of the Jews to Jerusalem; as their fathers had come out of Egypt to Canaan, through a waste and dreary wilderness: and it is considered as a command to make all things ready for their safe and commodious passage. (Notes, Ezra i. viii. 21—23.) But the coming of JEHOVAH to his people, not their return to Jerusalem, is predicted: and though his protecting presence with them on that occasion may be alluded to; yet this forms a feeble interpretation, compared with that of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament. John the Baptist, in the desert part of the land, (an apt emblem of the barren state of the Jewish church at that time,) was a herald sent to proclaim the approach of Christ, as JEHOVAH their God.—When powerful or victorious monarchs, at the head of their armies, march through countries, where highways are not previously cast up; they are used to send pioneers before them, to level the country, to cut ways through impervious mountains and defiles, to make bridges over rivers, to cast up roads through morasses and deep valleys, and to make their march as straight and unobstructed as possible. 'Diodorus's account of Semiramis's marches into Media and Persia, will give us a clear notion of the preparation of the way for a royal expedition.—'In her march to Ecbatane she came to the Zarcean mountain, which, extending many furlongs, and being full of craggy precipices and deep hollows, could not be passed without taking a great compass about. Being therefore desirous of leaving an everlasting memorial of herself, as well as of shortening the way, she ordered the precipices to be digged down, and the hollows to be filled up; and at a great expense she made a shorter, and a more expeditious road, which to this day is called 'from her, the road of Semiramis.' Bp. Lowth. A spiritual preparation, of a similar nature, was needful for the coming of Christ, and the setting up of his kingdom. John the Baptist's ministry was calculated to excite the attention of the people; to convince, alarm, and humble them; to subvert their self-confident prejudices and carnal expectations; to shew them their need of a spiritual redemption, and to raise their expectations of those blessings, which the Messiah was actually to bestow on them. This tended to "prepare the way of the LORD," and to make all straight and level for his reception, and the success of his gospel. (*Notes, Matt. iii. 1—4. 7—12. Mark i. 1—11. 36. Acts xiii. 24—37.) And the first Jewish converts to Christianity seem to have been in general prepared by John's ministry, for that of Christ and his apostles. (Notes, John i. 35—51.) Thus "the glory of the LORD was revealed" to them, and through them to the Gentiles; this light has hitherto been continued to many nations, and at length "all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it."—The Septuagint here read, "All flesh shall see the salvation of our God;" and this is quoted by the evangelist. (Note, Luke iii. 4—6, v. 6.)—The Jewish church, to which John was sent to announce the coming of the Messiah, was at that time in a barren and desert condition, unfit, without reformation, for the reception of her King. It was in this desert country, at that time destitute of all religious instruction, in true piety and good works unfruitful, that John was sent to prepare the way of the Lord by preaching repentance.' Bp. Lowth.

V. 6—8. 'To understand rightly this passage is a matter of importance: for it seems designed to give us the true key to the remaining part of Isaiah's prophecies; the general subject of which is the restoration of the people and church of God. The prophet opens the subject with great clearness and elegance. He then introduces a voice commanding him to make a solemn proclamation; And what is the import of it? That the people, the flesh, is of a vain temporary nature; that all its glory fadeth and is soon gone; but that the word of God endureth for ever. What is this but a plain opposition of the ... carnal Israel to the spiritual; of the temporary Mo-saick economy to the eternal Christian dispensation? You may be ready to conclude, (the prophet may be supposed to say,) by this introduction to my discourse, that my commission is only to comfort you with a promise of the restoration of your religion and polity, of Jerusalem, and the temple, and its services and worship in all its ancient splendour: these are earthly, temporary, shadowy, fading things: ... these are not worthy to engage your attention, in comparison of the greater blessings, the spiritual redemption, the eternal inheritance, covered under the veil of the former, which I have it in charge to unfold unto you. The law is only the shadow of good 'things, the substance is the gospel, ... which shall never be done away, but shall endure for ever.' Bp. Lowth. —The impotency of man, in all his glory, to oppose the purposes of God, seems also to be intended. Thus the Chaldean prosperity withered when the time came for the Jews to be delivered; and the Jews lost all their honours and privileges, when the kingdom of Christ was to be established.—The carnal expectations of the Jews, respecting the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom may likewise be adverted to. The word translated "goodliness" properly signifies excellency, moral excellency, even piety, justice, truth, and mercy: and thus the passage shews the vanity and insufficiency of all human virtues, as well as of human power, accomplishments, and splendours, without the word of the gospel which endureth for ever, and without that regeneration which alone can render it effectual. (Notes, Ps. ciii. 5—18. Zech. iv. 4—7. 1 Cor. i. 26—3 Jam. i. 9—11. 1 Pet. i. 22—25.)

The Spirit, &c. (7) "The wind of JEHOVAH." (Ps. ciii. 16.) 'As wind and storms deface the beauty of the grass and flowers; so the breath of God's displeasure blasts the counsels of men, and brings them and their designs to nought.' Lowth.

V. 9—11. The former part of this paragraph is rendered by some, and by Bishop Lowth in particular, "O thou, that bringest good tidings to Zion, &c." And, as it is in the feminine gender, it is supposed to allude to the custom of women leading companies, with songs and dances, to celebrate great deliverances; as in the cases of Miriam and Jephthah's daughter. (Notes, Ex. xv. 20, 21. Judg. v. 1. xi. 34—40. 1 Sam. xviii. 6—9. Ps. lxviii. 11, 12.) Zion, or "the daughter of Zion" as the announcer of the glad tidings, being feminine, may account for that particularity. Indeed, not only Wisdom in Proverbs, but the word rendered "the Preacher," in Ecclesiastes, is feminine. (Notes, Prov. i. 20. Ec. i. 1.)—But as Zion and Jerusalem evidently mean the inhabitants of Zion; and as the glad tidings are ordered to be declared to the cities of Judah; this interpretation, though not requiring any alteration of the text, seems inadmissible. When any of the inhabitants of Zion brought glad tidings from the court of Persia; they were required strenuously to publish them to the cities of Judah, encouraging them with the assurance of the presence and help of Israel's God. But this is only a shadow of the real meaning. The glad tidings of the advent of Christ was not only brought to Zion; but was from thence sent forth into the cities of Judah, and to all the ends of the earth. The first preachers of the gospel, after the day of Pentecost, published the glad tidings with all boldness, beginning at Jerusalem, proceeding to the cities of Judah, and then to the Gentiles. (Notes, ii. 2—5. Ez. xlvii. 1—10. Luke xxiv. 44—49. Acts i. 4—8.) The church, the true Zion, ought from age to age thus strenuously to disseminate the glad tidings of salvation; and the most distinguished Christians should animate those who are less eminent and more timid.—The Jews were directed thus to encourage each other to expect their promised Messiah, until he came: and we ought thus to excite one another to expect his coming to render his cause universally triumphant; and at the appointed period to judge the world. In all these respects Zion is commanded to proclaim to all her children, and to all the earth, "Behold your God!" "O Zion and Jerusalem, do ye proclaim to all the world the goodness of your God to you, and therefore take all advantage of the highest mountains to publish it. ... Since it is to you that God imparts the first tidings of a Saviour, do ye gladly and zealously divulge it to all the earth; and say to the other cities of Judah, concerning the Messiah to be exhibited in the flesh, "Behold your God." Bp. Hall. (Notes, Matt. xxviii. 18—20. Mark xvi. 14—16. Acts xiii. 42—48.) For the Lord GOD, (or the Lord JEHOVAH, as in the original,) would come "with a strong hand," or, "against a strong one," even that potent enemy of the church, of whom persecuting tyrants have always been both types and agents: his own arm would both establish his authority, and administer his kingdom: the recompence of his humiliation and sufferings, (namely, the exaltation of his human nature, the salvation of his people, and the honour of all the divine perfections through his mediatorial work,) was with him; (Notes, xlix. 3—6. Heb. xii. 2, 3;) or, he came prepared to reward his true disciples, and punish his obstinate enemies. "His work was before him," and he was fully purposed and qualified to go through with it. His condescension and tenderness, to his flock of redeemed sinners, would equal his power and wrath against his enemies. He would "as a Shepherd" supply all their wants, and watch over their souls, and consider all their infirmities, malaknowledge, and shewed to him the way of understanding?

dies, and dangers: he would collect together young converts, feeble believers, and tempted and afflicted persons, with especial care; affording them adequate protection and consolation, and moderating their trials: even as the tender shepherd takes the feeble lamb, when benumbed with wet and cold, and cherishes it in his bosom; and is peculiarly careful not to over-drive or injure the pregnant ewes, or those that have lately brought forth their young.—As this is an evident prophecy of Christ, and as he is the good Shepherd and the chief Shepherd; so he must be Israel's God, and the Lord JEHOVAH: nor can these prophecies be otherwise interpreted, without obscuring and wresting their plain meaning, and causing this most elegant and sublime of all writers to express himself in a very improper and discordant manner; or rather, without representing the language of the Holy Spirit, as calculated to mislead the simple and honest reader. (Notes, lxiii. 11—14. Ps. xxiii. 1—3. v. 1. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. Mic. v. 2—4. Zech. xiii. 7. Matt. xxvi. 30—35. John x. 10—18. Heb. xiii. 20, 21. 1 Pet. v. 1—4.)
V. 12—17. There is no intimation of any change of person in the transition, from the tender "Shepherd," to this most sublime representation of JEHOVAH: so that this divine majesty is evidently ascribed to the Son equally with the Father; for "He and the Father are One." (Note, John x. 26—31.)—This seems especially introduced, to remind the Jews of JEHOVAH's power to effect their deliverance from Babylon, and that spiritual redemption typified by it. The grandeur of this passage, in sentiment and expression, as much exceeds all the admired sublimity of uninspired writers, as the light of the sun does that of a taper: and we should not only consider it in the sublimity of a poet; but also that of a prophet, speaking of the infinite God, in language worthy of his subject, as far as human language possibly can be so. No representations of this kind in the writings of men, which have not evidently been taken from the scripture, give satisfaction to the reflecting mind, but always appear to degrade the subject. But here the mind grasps at the majestic sentiments, yet cannot contain them; and the reflecting reader is satisfied, that thus it becomes JEHOVAH to speak of himself, if he would convey any ideas of his incomprehensible perfections to our narrow and clouded understandings. To determine the quantity of water for the earth and ocean, by meting it out in the hollow of his hand, and the extent of the heavens by his span; to give out the dust, of which the whole of dry land is formed, by a small measure; and to weigh the hills and mountains in a balance, when he proportioned them in creation:—what thoughts are these, and how do they lead the mind to enlarged apprehensions of the greatness of the Creator, and cause all created beings to shrink, as it were, to nothing in the comparison! Could this glorious Lord want any counsellor, or coadjutor? Did it behove any of his creatures to dictate to him, how he ought to act with wisdom and justice? or could any pretend that they had thus instructed him? (Notes, Job xxi. 17-22, v. 22. Rom. xi. 33-36. 1 Cor. ii. 14-16.) Indeed all the nations of the earth are to him, but as a drop of water from the bucket, to the immensity of the ocean; or as the small disregarded dust upon the balance, to the whole earth. He removes all the isles of the sea as an atom; and all the cedars of Lebanon would not suffice for fuel, nor all its cattle for a burnt-offering, if a sacrifice worthy of his majesty should be attempted: much less could such an oblation atone for the sins committed against him. But no illustration can reach the truth: for all nations before God, are “as nothing;” they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity; and so are all their magnificence, and their ostentatious superstitions.

V. 18-20. Contrasted with the view of the divine glory above given, how abominable and absurd must the worship of images appear! what similitude can be made of God, which is not infinitely dishonourable to him? Yet how general, how nearly universal, has this absurd and impious practice been among men! (Notes, Ex. xv. 11. xx. 4, 5.) The more wealthy and liberal of the Gentiles cast the image indeed of inferior metal, but employed the goldsmith to plate it with gold, and both to adorn and fasten it with silver chains: and this was intended as the likeness and visible representative of their god, the object of their worship! Nay, the poor man, who could scarcely afford an oblation, or he who chose to be penurious in his religion, must yet have an idol, though it were but a block of durable wood, skilfully carved, and fixed up in his house. Even the Israelites, and the Jews, when the ten tribes had separated from them, notwithstanding all their religious advantages, were surprisingly prone to the same irrational and senseless practice: because they disliked the holy character and spiritual worship and service of JEHOVAH. But as they had no reason to fear either idols or idolaters, when God came to effect their promised deliverances; so nothing could so much provoke God to jealousy, and bring ruin upon them, as this abomination.—‘Hereby he armeth ^tthem against the idolatry, wherewith they should be ^utempted at Babylon.’ (*Notes, xli. 5-7. xlv. 9-20. V. 21-24. “Will ye not know? Will ye not hear? “Hath it not been declared to you from the beginning? “&c.” Bp. Lowth. This is more literal than our version—Would not the people after all understand? Would they not hearken to the word of God, which approved itself so fully to their minds and consciences? Had not the Jews known, and heard from the beginning? Nay, had not the Gentiles sufficient information, from the foundations of the earth, and in the things created, concerning the “eternal “power and Godhead” of the Creator? (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, Rom. i. 18-23.) He sitteth upon his throne in the heavens, which environ the earth as a circle: thence he beholds the puny efforts of all its inhabitants, like those of insignificant grasshoppers. He has veiled himself with the vast expanse of the firmament, as with a curtain; and dwells beyond it, in invisible glory, as in a pavilion. (Notes, Ps. civ. 2, 3.)—Disdaining the vain ambition, and the daring but impotent rebellion of wicked princes, he brings them and their devices to nothing; so that they cannot establish themselves, or their posterity, as they purpose and expect to do: for he will not suffer them to be planted or sown, or to take root: but in anger he blows on them, and they wither, and are driven away as the stubble by the whirlwind. (Notes, xiv. 21-23. 1 Sam. ii. 4-8. Ps. lxxv. 4-8.)—The revolutions in the great empires of the world are intended, especially the subversion of the Babylonish empire by Cyrus, which made way for the restoration of the Jews. (Notes, Dan. iv.) Nebuchadnezzar and his successors had attempted to perpetuate the grandeur of their family; but the Lord blew upon it, and it all came to nothing.

V. 25, 26. (Notes, 18—20. Ps. lxxxix. 6—12.) Nothing could be mentioned, which might with the least appearance of propriety be likened to JEHOVAH, except the sun, moon, and stars: and these appear to have been adored as deities, in one form or other, from the earliest ages, and almost in every nation; though a few of the philosophers of Greece or Rome, saw, or seemed to see, a superior Intelligence directing them, which however produced in them no practical effects. But the Lord says by his prophet, Who hath created these splendid luminaries? They are the host, or army, of Israel's God, numbered, marshalled, and commanded by him, as if he spake to them by name: and because of the exceeding greatness of his mighty power, not one of them failed to fulfil his will, and shine in its appointed season, from age to age. (Notes, xlv. 7. li. 4—6. Gen. ii. 1, 2. Deut. iv. 19. Job xxxi. 24—28. xxxviii. 12—15. 31—41. Ps. viii. 3—9. cxlviii. 1—5.)

V. 27—31. Jacob is here introduced as in great and permanent affliction: as was the case with the Jews in the captivity; as it is with Israel at present; and with the church under antichristian persecution. Every external appearance was discouraging: and they were apt to forget or distrust the power and promise of God, through long delays, many disappointments, and unbelief; and to conclude that he either disregarded them, and was not able to deliver them, or that he neglected to judge between them and their oppressors. (Notes, xlix. 14—16. Jer. xxxiii. 23—26. Rom. xi. 1—6.) But why should they harbour such gloomy thoughts? why judge so dishonourably of God? Had they never heard, or known, that “the everlasting God, JEHOVAH,” (Note, Ex. iii. 14;) the Creator of the world, was incapable of being wearied out, or fainting, or leaving his work unfinished? There was no “searching out of his understanding:” and therefore he could not be disconcerted by unforeseen obstructions, or for want of resources to obviate difficulties. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, lv. 8, 9. Ps. cxxxviii. 8.) When his wisdom should see the proper season to be arrived, he would certainly effect their deliverance: by his help, the most feeble and intimidated instruments would acquire great and increasing strength and courage. And whilst men of superior abilities and resolution, who confided in their own vigour, (as young men are apt to do,) would faint and be wearied out, in all their attempts to save themselves, or effect their purposes: those “who waited on the LORD,” and relied on him for wisdom and support, should repair the decays of their spiritual strength after every conflict, and make continual accessions to it; till they mounted aloft, as on eagles' wings, out of the reach of their enemies: nor would they grow weary in their race, or faint in their walk, till they reached the glorious goal, and received the conqueror's crown. (Marg. Ref. m—q.—Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 23—28, v. 26. cxxxviii. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 13—18, v. 16. xii. 7—10.) “They shall put forth fresh feathers, like the moulting eagle.” It has been a common and popular opinion, that the eagle lives and retains his vigour to a great age; and that, beyond the common lot of other birds, he moults in his old age, and renews his feathers, and with them his youth. ...Whether the notion of the eagle's renewing his youth is in any degree well founded or not, I need not enquire: it is enough for a poet, whether sacred or profane, to have the authority of popular opinion to support an image introduced for illustration or ornament. Bp. Lowth. (Note, Ps. ciii. 5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Those who walk with God need comforting, especially when iniquity abounds, and the church is in tribulation: accordingly he has commanded his ministers to “encourage the broken-hearted,” as well as “to warn the unruly:” and should the servant neglect or mistake his duty, the Lord himself will speak comfortably to them.—All effectual deliverances are connected with the pardon of iniquity; and in the great atonement of the death of Christ, the mercy of God is exercised to the exceeding glory of his justice and holiness. This is the fountain of all our consolations, and ensures a happy event to the warfare of the church, and of every real believer. Even in this desert world, where nothing but noxious creatures and productions, through man's apostasy, would otherwise have been found, a voice is heard calling on us to “prepare

CHAP. XLI.

JEHOVAH calls on the nations to consider his works for Israel, and describes the zeal of the idolaters about their idols, 1—7. He gives many promises and pre-

“the way of the LORD;” for he comes “to bless us, in “turning away every one...from his iniquities.” (Note, Acts iii. 24—26.) May he prepare our hearts, by the instructions of his word, and the convictions of his Spirit, cordially to welcome his salvation, and submit to his authority; that, every prejudice being removed, every proud and ambitious thought brought down, every grovelling passion subdued, the desire of things truly excellent and honourable implanted, our crooked and rugged tempers softened, and all obstructions removed; “the glory of the “LORD may be revealed” to our souls; and we may be made ready for his whole will on earth, and for his heavenly kingdom. And may his power remove all hindrances so the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth; that “his glory may be revealed, and that all flesh may “see it together.”—The Lord alone is worthy of unreserved fear and confidence: and what are all the connexions, possessions, distinctions, attainments, or performances of fallen man, but “as the grass and the flower of the “field?” When the Lord blows upon them with the breath of his displeasure, how soon they wither and fade! And what will the envied and admired titles and accomplishments of a dying sinner avail him, when they leave him under condemnation, and “a vessel of wrath fitted “for destruction?” But those, who rely on the word of God, which endureth for ever, shall possess unfading and eternal distinctions and treasures, however poor and despised they may be here on earth. These are the glad tidings brought unto us by Zion’s harbingers: may we gladly receive the word, and diligently diffuse it all around! All, who know this joyful sound, should thus endeavour by their bold and open profession of the truth, their holy examples, their fervent prayers, and all their influence, to communicate the blessing to others. And let ministers especially “cry aloud and not spare,” and point out to all, who enquire after salvation, the divine Redeemer, saying, “Behold your God!” “Behold, JEHOVAH has come in the flesh to “destroy the works of the devil:” he has finished his work on earth; he has ascended his mediatorial throne in heaven; all power is in his hands, and “his Arm shall rule for him; his reward is with him, “and his work before him.” Whilst he crushes his obstinate foes under his feet, he feeds his purchased flock with inexpressible tenderness and care; and he is ever ready to gather in the new convert, to cherish the feeble, the tempted, and afflicted; and to proportion the strength of every one to the trials allotted him. May we know our Shepherd’s voice, and follow him, and by our gentle, harmless conduct prove ourselves to be the sheep of his pasture: may he gather our children and relations, as his “lambs “with his arm, and carry them in his bosom:” and may numbers of those, who “are as sheep going astray,” be continually “brought back to this Shepherd and Bishop of “our souls!” For who is he, but Israel’s Shepherd, “that “measured the waters in the hollow of his hand?” This is the support of all our hopes, that, with the Father and dictions of assistance, victory, and prosperity to his people; and of the conversion of the Gentiles, 8—20. He challenges the idols of the nations to foretell future events and accomplish them, as he did; and predicts the conquests of Cyrus, and the deliverance of the Jews from captivity, 21—29.

the blessed Spirit, our Jesus is JEHOVAH, “God over all “blessed for evermore.”

V. 12—31.

As we cannot comprehend the mysterious nature, and the majesty of the Lord our God; let us learn to admire and adore those displays of his perfections, which are made in his works, and in his word. Let us abase ourselves before him, deeply sensible of our meanness as creatures, and our vileness as sinners: and let us never presume to object to his appointments or decisions, as if we were qualified to “teach Him knowledge,” before whom “all nations are “as nothing and vanity.” And what are all man’s attempts to expiate his own sins, and merit an eternal inheritance? It costs more than the whole creation to ransom our souls; and “must have been let alone for ever,” if “the only “begotten of the Father” had not given himself for us, a sacrifice of infinite value. With this God is well pleased: but all the power, wisdom, pride, and ostentation of sinful creatures, are with him “less than nothing;” abominable, as well as vain.—Surely fallen man’s boasted reason is a blind guide in religion: when he has always been prone to represent God, by images made like to corruptible man, or the inferior creatures! And though we do not now, and in this our land, generally make images of gold, silver, wood, or stone, to worship them; we are still apt to conceive of God, as being such a one as ourselves. Yet, we at least have abundant opportunity of becoming so acquainted with his perfections, (were not our carnal minds at enmity against him,) as to be convinced, that we can conceive nothing in the smallest degree proper to represent him to our minds; except it be his holy image renewed upon the soul of believers, which gives us some faint idea of his moral excellency: but of his infinite majesty we can form no conception. (Note, Job xxvi. 14.) Wretched then are the mightiest princes, who rebel against him: he will soon reduce them to the most abject contempt and misery; and all their schemes of aggrandizing themselves and their descendants, will be as vain, as if the stubble should attempt resistance to the furious whirlwind. But though “we “cannot find out the Almighty to perfection,” it behoves us to look about us, and to view his glory, in the works of his hands. The heavens, and all the host of them, proclaim “his eternal power and Godhead;” and the strength of his arm continues them in their settled orders, with a punctuality which can never be sufficiently admired. Nor let us forget, that he, who retains the planets in their orbits, spake all the promises, and stands engaged to perform them. Why then should believers despond, either respecting themselves, or the common cause of godliness? Their way, though dark to them, cannot be hid from him, and he will plead their cause and execute judgment for them. When the everlasting God has begun his work of grace, he will never faint, nor be weary, nor withdraw his hand, till he has perfected it. (Notes, Phil. i. 3—8.) But we should confide in his unsearchable wisdom, to perform his promises to us and to his church, in his own time and manner ; neither discouraged by the sense of our own weakness, nor by a view of the power of our enemies : as “ the LORD giveth power to the faint,” nay, to those who have no might he causeth strength to abound. (Notes, Phil. iv. 10—13. Col. i. 9—14, v. 11.) Let us then watch against unbelief, pride, and self-confidence : for if we go forth in our own strength, we “ shall faint, and utterly “ fall,” however strong we may think ourselves. But if we wait on the Lord, out of weakness we shall be made strong ; and having our hearts and hopes in heaven, we shall be carried above all difficulties, and enabled to press forward, and lay hold of “ the prize of our high calling in “ Christ Jesus.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. JEHOVAH speaks through the whole of this chapter. He here calls on the most distant nations, in reverent silence, to hearken to the proofs which he is about to give, that he is the only true God, and that all their idols are nothing ; and when they had attentively considered the subject, let them collect all their resolution, and draw near to plead their cause ; that the controversy might at length be finally decided, whether JEHOVAH or their idols was entitled to their worship and service. (Notes, 21—24. 1 Kings xviii. 21. Ps. xlv. 10. Hab. ii. 18—20. Zech. ii. 10—13.)—Islands.] “ Those countries that were ‘ parted from Judea by the sea.’ Lowth.—People.] Or peoples ; ^a לְאֻמִּים, plural.

V. 2—4. Some eminent expositors suppose Cyrus to be here meant : but it is not likely that he should be called “ the righteous man ;” (or righteousness, Marg.) nor could the success of that monarch give any general alarm to idolaters.—JEHOVAH is pointing out to the nations the evidences of his being the only true God ; and is about to predict those events, which will terminate in the extirpation of idolatry : but he previously calls the attention of mankind at large to the victories, which had already been obtained by his worshippers over idolaters. The calling of Abraham, from the eastern country of Mesopotamia, was the first remarkable check, which God gave to idolatry after the flood, when it was about to become universal ; and the opening of that grand design, by which the whole empire of Satan was in due time to be entirely subverted. (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. xlix. 10.) As the pattern of all future believers, both in the manner of his justification and the effects of his faith, Abraham was properly distinguished as “ the righteous man.” The Lord called him “ to his foot,” that is, to follow him in the most implicit

5 The ^m isles saw it, and feared ; ⁿ the ends of the earth were afraid, drew near, and came.
6 They ^o helped every one his neigh-and unreserved confidence and obedience. (Note, Heb. xi. 8—10.) And, though he was not a warrior on any other occasion ; yet, relying on the power of JEHOVAH, he once marched forth at the head of a small company of his servants, against four victorious heathen kings and their armies : and God gave them before him, and made him victorious over them ; so that they became as dust, or stubble driven by the wind, before his sword and bow : and he pursued them with entire safety, through those parts of the land, into which he had never before travelled. (Notes, Gen. xiv. 14—20.) This, and other interpositions of God in his favour, gave him a great ascendancy over kings and nations : and were earnest of the victories, which were promised to his posterity, and in due time granted them.—The king and people of Egypt first fell before the God of Israel ; and then Arad, Sihon, and Og, with their subjects ; and then the inhabitants of Canaan : and thus Abraham, in his seed, ruled over many kings and nations. These events were extensively known, and could not be denied ; and they caused great alarms in the adjacent regions. (Note, 5—7.) Now, who had effected these victories of Israel over the idolaters ? Even He, who had also predicted them, and had from the beginning called the generations of Israel from among the rest of the nations, speaking of them as already existing. And as JEHOVAH, the self-existent and eternal God, had been present with his people at first, so he would be to the last, to support them and render them triumphant. (Notes, xlv. 6—8. Ex. iii. 14. Rev. i. 8—11. ii. 8, 9.) “ Some explain this of Abraham ; ‘ others of Cyrus. I rather think that the former is meant, ‘ because the character of the righteous man, or righteous‘ ness, agrees better with Abraham, than with Cyrus. Be‘ sides, immediately after the description of the success ‘ given by God to Abraham, and his posterity, (who, I ‘ presume, are to be taken into the account,) the idolaters

‘ are introduced as greatly alarmed at this event. Abra‘ ham was called out of the east ; and his posterity were ‘ introduced into the land of Canaan, in order to destroy ‘ the idolaters of that country ; and they were established ‘ there, on purpose to stand as a barrier against idolatry, ‘ then prevailing, and threatening to over-run the whole face ‘ of the earth. Cyrus... had nothing in his character to ‘ cause such an alarm among the idolaters, 5—7.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 5—7. The success which attended the servants of JEHOVAH, is here represented, as exciting the apprehensions of the most distant nations, lest the cause of idolatry should be ruined. So that, being instigated by that ambitious spirit, who is worshipped by idolaters as “the god of this world,” they combine together, and stimulate and encourage each other to support their senseless worship, and render it prevalent against the cause of God and Israel. This was the case when Israel conquered Canaan, and in their wars with the Philistines and others. It was still more remarkably so, when Christianity was established on the ruins of Pagan idolatry; and we have reason to expect that a similar scene will be exhibited, when antichristian idolatry shall be extirpated. (Notes, Ex. xv. 14—16. 1 Sam. iv. 7—9. v. 3—12. vi. 2—9. Acts xix. 23—41.)—The word rendered “carpenter,” is in the former chapter translated “workman,” and joined with metteth. (xl. 19.) Some of the images were carved of wood, and covered with plates of gold. (Notes, xl. 18—20. xlv. 12—17.)

V. 8, 9. The Lord, seems in disdain, to leave the idolaters to weary themselves in forming their idols, and strengthening their cause: (Note, Hab. ii. 12—14:) and addresses himself to his people, to encourage them with assurances of support and victory. Israel was the servant and worshipper of JEHOVAH, through his gracious choice, and as “the seed of Abraham,” whom he had favoured and honoured with the peculiar name and privileges of his friend, “a lover of God.” (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 12—22. John xv. 12—16. Jam. ii. 21—24.) Abraham had been called out of Mesopotamia, and the Israelites out of Egypt, from among the chief men of the earth; and the Lord still adhered to his choice: though he had corrected and proved them by many adversities, yet he had not cast them off. (Notes, 1 Sam. xii. 22. Rom. xi. 25—32.)—But in these respects Israel was a type of the chosen seed, who are brought from every part of the earth into this church, made the servants, the friends, and children of God, who will never reject them, or leave them to perish. (Marg. Ref. x, y, Note, Deut. vii. 6—8.)—The word (הַחֲסִידִים), translated taken, seems equivalent to that used by St. Paul, concerning his own conversion: “for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.” (Note, Phil. iii. 12—14.)

V. 10—14. “Fear not ... for I have strengthened thee, “I have assisted thee, I have supported thee with my “faithful right hand.” Bp. Lowth. Past deliverances are mentioned, to encourage the expectations of future protection and support.—The security and victories of the church are, however, here predicted and promised: and the prophecy is couched in such terms, as can be fully accomplished only by the most complete triumph of true religion over all idolatry and iniquity; yet at the same time it consists of promises, suited to the encouragement of believers through successive ages. They know themselves to be feeble, and see the cause of godliness destitute of external defence; but they are assured, that the Lord is with his church, and every true member of it: therefore they ought not to be dismayed by the number or power of their enemies. JEHOVAH himself will strengthen, assist, and uphold his people, with his powerful arm performing his faithful promises, and maintaining his righteous cause.—The powerful monarchies which in succession have been incensed against the church, and have contended with her, and which have warred against the nation of Israel, have been put to shame, and brought to nothing: and this prediction has already been fulfilled, in the ruin of the Egyptian, Assyrian, Chaldean, Macedonian, and Roman empires, which we now may seek for in vain; for no vestiges of the three former, and scarcely any of the last, can be found; while the church still subsists, and the Jews still remain a distinct people! (Notes, xxvii. 7—11. liv. 15—17. Ps. xxxvii. 10, 11. 35, 36. Jer. x. 11. xxx. 10, 11. Dan. ii. 40—45. vii. 23—27. Zech. xii. 2—5. xiv. 1—3.) In like manner, all who now do, or hereafter shall, contend with his people, shall perish. For JEHOVAH leads them by the right hand to the conflict; and both inspires them with courage and strength, and fights for them: and though 15 Behold, ^m I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument having ⁿ teeth: ⁿ thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff.

16 Thou ^o shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them, and thou shalt rejoice in the LORD, and shalt glory in the Holy One of Israel.

17 When ^a the poor and needy ^r seek water, and there is none, and ^s their tongue faileth for thirst, ^t I the LORD will hear them, ^u I the God of Israel will not forsake them.

18 I will ^x open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys:

they are as “worms,” in the contempt poured upon them, in their own humble sense of their weakness and meanness, and in their low and abject condition, and few men in comparison with their enemies; (Note, Ps. xxii. 4—6, v. 6;) yet their “Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel,” will render them victorious.—“God’s truth shall at last prevail against all opposition: and the kingdom of Christ shall subdue and break in pieces all its adversaries.” Lowth.

V. 15, 16. Deep rooted idolatrous empires, and systems of idolatry, superstition, and imposture, are like impassable mountains; and form obstructions to the propagation of the gospel, insuperable to man: but the Lord will furnish his church, from time to time, with proper and adequate instruments to destroy, or remove out of the way, and even to disperse as chaff and dust, all remains of them. Or, “he will form and constitute the church to be such a “threshing instrument, &c.” Something of this kind was done, in the ruin of the Chaldean monarchy, in order to Israel’s deliverance from captivity; and far more in the subversion of the Pagan Roman empire, in order to the establishment of Christianity: but future events will more signally illustrate the propriety of the strong metaphors here employed, which are taken from the methods of threshing and winnowing corn, that were then in use. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10—14. xxviii. 23—29. Mic. iv. 11—13.)

V. 17—20. The care taken to supply water and provisions for the poor Jews, and to defend them, when they returned from Babylon, as their fathers had been provided for in the wilderness; (Notes, Ex. xvi. xvii;) and the re-establishment of their church and state, in the desolated land of Judah; form but feeble accomplishments of this remarkable prophecy. We meet with repeated predictions of the conversion of the Gentiles, and of spiritual blessings, under similar allusions. (Notes, xii. 3. xxx. 23—25. xxxv. 5—7. xlii. 13—17. xliii. 14—21. xlv. 3—5. xlix. 9—13.)—The provision, which is made for the consolation of the poor and humble people of God, in all their distresses and persecutions from age to age, may be implied: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.

19 I will ^y plant in the wilderness ^z the cedar, the shittah-tree, and the myrtle, and the oil-tree: I will set in the desert the fir-tree, and the pine, and the box-tree together;

20 That they ^a may see, and know, ^b and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the LORD hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it.

22 Let them bring them forth, ^e and shew us what shall happen: let them shew the former things, what they be,

plied: but perhaps some intimation may also be given of the method, in which the Lord will accomplish his promises of spreading the gospel. By “the poor and needy, “who seek water and find none,” he may describe the case of people, destitute of the means of grace, yet brought to some indistinct, but anxious desires of instruction and spiritual blessings. Cornelius and his friends, (the first Gentile converts,) were thus prepared to receive the gospel, before it was sent to them: and Paul was called into Europe by “a vision of a man of Macedonia,” who begged him to come over and help them. (Notes, Acts x. 1—8. xvi. 6—12.) Indeed we know not in what degree the Lord may facilitate the promulgation of Christianity, in due time, by exciting desires of instruction and salvation, in the minds of those, who have not hitherto heard the gospel. Such desires will dictate earnest prayers, and the Lord will hear them, and not leave the suppliants destitute: and many effects of the late and present exertions, for making the word of God known to the most distant and ignorant nations, seem already to have produced, and are well calculated still more to produce, this kind of preparation for the gospel. Thus rivers, fountains, and wells of salvation, shall be opened in the most unlikely places; and trees of righteousness, both ornamental and fruitful, shall flourish in abundance, throughout the barren desert of the Gentile world. (Note, lv. 11, 12.) As these predictions shall be more and more accomplished, the power, truth, and love of God, will be seen, known, and considered more and more generally; and the progress of the gospel will be with accelerated motion, as the stone falls to the earth with increasing rapidity.—“I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, &c.” “as it were on purpose to shelter my people, in their return home, from the scorching heat of the sun.” Lowth. (Notes, xxv. 3—5. xxxii. 1, 2. Cant. ii. 3.)

V. 21—24. In these prophecies, JEHOVAH speaks to mankind through all generations; and as his predictions are accomplished, his conclusions become still more strictly demonstrative. Let the nations, in the mean time, plead

28 For ⁿ I beheld, and there was no man; even among them, and for their idols, and produce their most cogent arguments. Let them bring forth some ancient authenticated oracles, which had already received as signal an accomplishment, as the prophecies made to Abraham, or to Israel, had done: nay, let them give some satisfactory account of the creation of the world, and the transactions of former times, which might stand in competition with that given by Moses; and let them foretel the event of them. Or let them now utter some prophecies, like these of JEHOVAH's prophets, which, coming to pass in process of time, might justify their claim to be worshipped as gods: yea, let them interpose to inflict miraculous judgments upon their despisers, or to effect miraculous deliverances for their worshippers; that the people of JEHOVAH might evidently behold it together, and be dismayed; as the Egyptians, Canaanites, Philistines, and Assyrians had been, at the wonderful works of God. (Notes, Ex. xii. 31—36. xv. 14—16. Josh. ii. 8—16. 1 Sam. iv. 7—9. 2 Kings xix. 35—37.) But indeed the idols and their works were alike nothing; and they who chose them in preference to the true God, were an abomination to him.—“Let those of ‘your idols, which ye think most powerful, approach.’” Jerom. I prefer this to all other interpretations of this place (21). ... The false gods are called upon to come forth and appear in person, and to give evident demonstration of their foreknowledge and power, by foretelling future events, and exerting their power in doing good or evil.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 25. JEHOVAH here predicts the victories of Cyrus over the Chaldeans and their allies, at least a hundred and fifty years before that expedition was undertaken; as one instance of his fore-knowledge and invincible power. (Notes, xiii. 17. xxi. 1—10.) Media lay north of Babylon, and Persia eastward, and Cyrus commanded the forces of these two nations. The Lord raised him up to great power, and formed him a man of extraordinary courage and capacity. It is not indeed recorded, that he renounced idolatry, to become the worshipper of God only; yet his decree proves, that he paid some honour and worship to his name, and thus may be said to have called on him: (Note, Ezra i. 1—4:) and by his wonderful success he trampled down mighty monarchs, as mortar, or as the potter treads the clay. It will appear, as we proceed, that the deliverance of the Jews was a typical event; and consequently

V. 26. (Note, 21—24.) This is another challenge to idolaters, to prove that their idols had ever declared future events in this manner; that it might be confessed they had a righteous claim to adoration. But, in fact, none of them ever shewed, or declared any thing of the kind; none ever heard their words to this effect. (Notes, 1 Kings xviii. 26—29.)—It is probable, that the Sibylline books, and other pretended prophecies among the heathens, were framed in consequence of this challenge, through the subtlety of Satan, and to evade the force of this argument: and the most plausible part of them seems to have been pillaged from the prophecies of scripture.—Doubtless fallen angels possess vast conjectural foresight; and, if permitted, could give general intimations of future events, which might frequently come to pass accordingly. But the certain knowledge of futurity must be peculiar to God, who has formed his whole plan, and in performing it fulfils at once his decrees and predictions. In fact all prophecies, except those of the Bible, have been couched in ambiguous terms, and the performance has been dubious and uncertain. They have been exactly such, as might previously have been expected, from the subtlety, sagacity, and foresight of the highest created intelligence, apostatized from God, and excluded from all acquaintance with his secret purposes: and a few occasional instances, in which they have come to pass, have been used to hide the shame of numerous failures; or their ambiguity has prevented the detection of them. But the prophecies of scripture form a regular system, which is fulfilling from age to age, without any failure, or appearance of it. The time of accomplishment was in several instances named, and the exact performance may be demonstrated: and some evidently relate to future times; being so arranged that we can tell very nearly the period, in the series of predicted events, in which we live. And this forms the grand demonstration to mankind at large of the divine original of the scriptures, on which the Lord himself here evidently rests the weight of the argument: and it gathers strength in proportion as that from miracles may be supposed to lose some part of its energy. (Notes, xlii. 8, 9. xliii. 8—13.)

V. 27—29. JEHOVAH, the First and the Last, (Note, 2—4,) first gave notice to Zion of future deliverers, the Medes and Persians : and he sent his prophets to announce the glad tidings of their redemption, before the commencement of their captivity. Now which of the idols of the Gentiles ever had done, or could do the like ? Which of them, or of their priests and oracles, had given any intimation of these events ? The more the case was examined, the plainer must it appear that they could give no counsel to their worshippers, or answer to their enquiries ; for they were all vanity, wind, and confusion. (Notes, Hab. ii. 18, 19. 1 Cor. xii. 1—3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—7.

When the religion of the Bible, and the ground on which it rests, have been reverently and carefully investigated, they are found to have undoubted reason and argument on their side. But the enmity of men's hearts, against the humbling, holy truths and precepts of this precious book, disposes them rather to strengthen themselves, and collect together every apparent argument and plausible objection, which they can devise against them ; than impartially to examine with a disposition to be convinced and governed by them. Yet the question must be decided at length : and, however men now plead in behalf of infidelity, or impiety, or heresy, they will have nothing to say, when they draw near together to meet the Lord upon his judgment seat.—Every work of God, in accomplishing the prophecies and promises of his word, irrefragably proves his right to our confidence and obedience : and it is well worth our while minutely to consider all that he has done, from the beginning to this day, in fulfilling the antecedent revelations of his word. We should begin from the calling of righteous Abraham, and consider his care of that patriarch, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, and of Joseph : we should review his wonders in Egypt, at the Red sea, in the wilderness, and in Canaan : we should meditate on “ the wars of the LORD ” under Joshua, the Judges, Samuel, and David ; and on the wonders performed for Israel during the reigns of Asa, Jehoshaphat, and Hezekiah : and remember, that the authenticity of these histories is fully ascertained, by the concurring prophecies fulfilling at this day. We should next reflect on the return of the captive Jews from Babylon, and their preservation during the prevalence of successive conquerors and oppressors, until the birth of the promised Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, and Son of David. We should compare with these ancient prophecies the history of his character, miracles, doctrine, life, death, resurrection, and kingdom ; the establishment of his religion in the world, and its continuance hitherto ; notwithstanding the opposition against it from without, and the various methods within, which have been employed to corrupt it. We should also turn aside to contemplate the desolations of Nineveh, Babylon, and Tyre ; and even of Jerusalem, when the Saviour had been rejected by his professed worshippers : and whilst the New Testament authenticates all these predictions ; we may behold its divine authority demonstrated, in the dis-person and preservation of the Jews as a distinct people ; (Note, Luke xxi. 20—24 ;) in the long continued corruptions of popery ; and in a variety of other events, which cannot here be particularized. Now, who has wrought and done all these things, according to these ancient predictions, but “ the everlasting God,” who has also predicted the ruin of idolaters and unbelievers, and the full salvation of his people ? Well may determined infidels and idolaters be dismayed, at hearing and seeing such things : for all their efforts to uphold their tottering cause will be in vain ; it will shortly be ruined, and every remaining prediction will also be performed.

V. 8—20.

Happy are the chosen and righteous servants of the Lord, whom he has called to be his friends, and to walk with him by faith, and in holy obedience ! If we have thus been favoured, let us not yield to fear, in the prospect of dangers or enemies : our God will be our Guide and Strength, in every service and difficulty : our conflict may be sharp, but our victory will be sure ; all who hate, oppose, or harass us, shall be as nothing ; and we shall shortly be out of their reach, and see them no more for ever. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39.) Why then do we hesitate to pass through scenes of tribulation or persecution ; or even through the gloomy valley of death, when the Lord God will hold our right hand, and both inspire courage and consolation ? And though we are weak and vile as worms, and the church consists hitherto of but a few despised men, struggling with difficulties like the strong mountains ; yet our God will carry us above them all : he will provide for the subverting of every empire on earth, which supports the great empire of Satan, and they shall all be reduced to nothing, or driven away as chaff by the whirlwind ; that “ we may rejoice in the LORD, and glory in the Holy One of Israel.”—These are the blessings reserved for “ the poor in spirit,” and such as “ hunger and thirst after righteousness ; ” who are become acquainted with their own character, situation, wants, and true interests, and who long for divine illumination, pardon, holiness, and spiritual consolation. Wherever they are placed, or how long soever the desired blessings are delayed, and “ they seek water, and find none, and their tongue faileth for thirst ; ” or however, through conscious guilt, or weakness of faith, they may think that the Lord will leave them destitute ; yet he will hear their prayers, and answer them, and not forsake them. In his infinite truth, power, wisdom, and mercy, and in “ the unsearchable riches of Christ,” they have a never-failing resource : and the Lord will supply all their wants, by means as unexpected, as if rivers should be opened on the tops of mountains, and fountains in the valleys. And, as he has planted “ trees of righteousness ” in the barren Gentile lands ; so will he render our barren souls fruitful in all the precious, ornamental, and pleasant fruits of his Spirit ; that all, who behold, “ may consider, and understand together, that the hand of the LORD hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it.”

V. 21—29.

Let the advocates for infidelity, or other doctrines than that of God our Saviour, now produce their cause, and bring forth their strong arguments. Can they shew such effects from their soothing and self-flattering systems, as have been, and constantly are produced by genuine Christianity? Or can the infidel answer the arguments from prophecy for the divine original of the scriptures? Can he match them with equal predictions from 'the oracles of reason?' Or satisfactorily explain the appearances of the natural and moral world? Can he prescribe an effectual cure for human depravity? Or give proof to a reflecting mind, that he is competent to establish any system of equal value, with that which he labours to degrade? Until he evidently does these things, we must aver, that his cavils spring from pride, and enmity to God and holiness, and are as irrational as they are impious; that they are worse than "nothing, and vanity;" and "those who choose them" "are an abomination."—But a Deliverer is raised up for us of nobler name and greater power, than the deliverer of the captive Jews: he will trample all his powerful enemies under his feet, that when He, who from the beginning has declared these things, shall fulfil them, all may acknowledge that he is righteous. He alone sends those, who "bring good tidings unto Zion;" and all that are not employed by him, can give no good counsel or instruction; nor solve 'he difficulties of distressed sinners, or speak one word to the purpose. May we then receive his salvation, cast away all our idols, and turn away our ears from hearing, and our eyes from beholding vanity; may we be numbered among his obedient servants and faithful friends, and rejoice in his holy consolation, in life, in death, and through eternal ages.

He is peculiarly tender to the broken-hearted, and those whom temptations and afflictions have almost crushed, like "the bruised reed;" and will by no means break them: he encourages the first beginning of holy desires in the young convert; and revives the almost expiring spark in the baffled and backsliding believer; though it be only as the offensive smoke from the stalks of the flax, when it does not break forth into a flame: and he will bring forth every man's judgment, with most perfect agreement to the truth of his case and character. This has hitherto been accomplished, only in part; but “he will not fail, nor be discouraged,” till it be more completely effected throughout the whole earth.

V. 5—7. JEHOVAH before spake of his beloved Son and “righteous Servant;” here he immediately addresses him. He, the great Creator of heaven and earth, and the Author and Preserver of the lives and souls of all men, declares that he had called, or appointed, the predicted Messiah, “in righteousness;” that is, to manifest his righteousness in the salvation of sinners, to fulfil his faithful engagements to his church, and to support the cause of righteousness on earth. Upholding and preserving him, he would give him to be the Surety, the Foundation, and the very Substance, of the new covenant; and the pledge and security of all the covenanted blessings to his people Israel: and likewise to be the Fountain of knowledge, holiness, and happiness to the Gentiles: in order that he might open those understandings which Satan had blinded, through pride, prejudice, and ignorance; and set at liberty from the bondage of sin, those who had been confined in, as in a noisome and dark dungeon; that they might enjoy the light, liberty, and comfort of his service. (Marg.

V. 8, 9. (Note, Ex. iii. 2—6.) JEHOVAH here again addresses mankind in general, declaring his essential glory and excellency, and that he would not give the honour and worship which belonged to him to any other; either fallen angels, or graven images, or even the most excellent and exalted of creatures: for no limitation can be admitted in so general a declaration.—But, as we are commanded “to honour the Son, even as we honour the Father,” we are sure he is more than Man or Creature, even one with the Father, in the unity of the divine nature. (Note, John v. 20—23.)—It is also added, that as the ancient prophecies received their accomplishment, new predictions were delivered, for the confirmation of true religion, through successive generations. (Notes, xli. 21—24. 26. xlv. 6—8.)

V. 10—12. The prophet, animated by the glorious subject, calls on the nations, even to the ends of the earth, and every remote region which navigation has discovered, with all their inhabitants, and the navigators themselves, to sing praises to JEHOVAH. And he exhorts those dark and barren regions, which are like the Arabian deserts, or the uncultivated top of a rock or mountain, to give glory and praise to him for the blessings of his salvation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxiv. 13—16. xlv. 23. xlix. 9—13, v. 13. lv. 12, 13.) “The expressions here, and in the parallel texts, denote the joy to be so great and universal, that even the inanimate parts of the creation ... are exhorted to bear a part in the general chorus.” Lowth.—Such exhortations imply predictions, that thus it would be at the time appointed. Indeed the latter part of this passage is future:—“The wilderness and the cities thereof shall lift up their voice, &c.”

federated enemies would obstruct his purpose of converting the Gentiles, and destroying idolatry: but he would, as a mighty warrior, with tremendous indignation, intimidate and destroy them. He had long “suffered the nations “to walk in their own ways,” and idolatry and iniquity to prevail: (Note, Acts xiv. 11—18, v. 16:) but at the appointed period he would break silence, and with the most vigorous exertions of almighty power, and vehement convulsions in providence, he would ruin his enemies, and effect his great designs. (Note, lix. 16—19.) The unbelieving Jews would indeed crucify the Redeemer, and obstruct the gospel; but he would turn their cultivated mountains into a waste, and make their rivers and pools dry land; that is, he would deprive them of their privileges, and cast them off from being his people. (Notes, xxix. 17—19. xxxv. 5—7, v. 7.) But he would bring the blind and benighted Gentiles into his church, by methods of which they had no previous knowledge; and lead them in the paths of truth, peace, and holiness, to which they had been entire strangers: he would afford them abundant light and instruction, open the eyes of their understandings, make their way plain and pleasant to them, and not cast them off from being his people. (Notes, 5—7. Acts xxvi. 16—18. Eph. v. 8—14. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)—This I suppose to be the prophetic meaning of this passage: but it has also a spiritual meaning, applicable to every believer. And this union of the prophetic and spiritual meaning forms one of the greatest beauties and excellences of this part of scripture; and exceedingly illustrates the divine wisdom by which it was dictated. (P. O. 13—25.)—The calling of the Gentiles would also be attended with the defeat and confusion of idolaters. (Notes, xli. 1—7.) This was remarkably the case in the primitive ages of Christianity: but the prophecy will have a more notable completion, when antichristian, as well as pagan, image-worshippers shall be confounded, put to shame, and perish for ever.

V. 18—20. The Lord here calls the Gentiles, who had been deaf to his voice, and blind to his glory, to hear and see; not without reference to the miracles of Christ. (Note, xxxv. 5—7, v. 5, 6.) Or, as some think, he upbraids the Jews with their blindness and obstinate unbelief. That nation gloried in being the servants and worshippers of JEHOVAH: yet not only others of them, but the priests, prophets, and rulers, who were his messengers to the people, were become more blind and deaf than even the Gentiles: and whilst they deemed themselves so perfect, so wise and righteous, that they needed no instructor, and no repentance, and despised others; they were given up to judicial blindness and obduracy. (Notes, Jer. v. 20—25. vi. 10, 11. Matt. xv. 12—14. xvi. 1—4. Rom. ii. 17—24.) The Jews, in our Saviour's time, saw indeed numerous miracles to prove his mission, yet they did not observe them to any good purpose: and though they attended on his ministry, as opening their ears to his word; yet they neither believed nor obeyed him. (Marg. Ref.)—‘The word,’ (rendered “he that is perfect,”) ‘is meshullam in the Hebrew; whence the Arabick Mussulman is derived, a title ‘the Mahometans give to themselves.’ Lowth. See article مسلم in Golius.

V. 21. This verse is variously interpreted. Some explain it of the willingness which the Lord had always shewn, to fulfil his covenant and promises to Israel, for the sake of shewing himself faithful and just; and thus to magnify and honour his word. (Note, Ps. cxxxviii. 2.)—“The Lord took delight in this people for his righteousness' sake; he hath given them an excellent law, and “thereby made them honourable.” Deut. iv. 6—8. ‘Their law, if they had kept close to it, would have been both ‘their ornament and defence.’ Lowth.—But these interpretations seem foreign to the subject of the prophecy, which is allowed to relate to the Messiah, and the conduct of the Jews in rejecting him: nor does it appear that the original can be made to bear this construction; but the verse may be thus rendered: “The Lord is well pleased, “because of his” (the Messiah's) “righteousness. He” (the Messiah) “will magnify and render honourable the “law.”—Christ “brought in an everlasting righteousness;” believers are “made the righteousness of God in “him;” his name is “the Lord our righteousness.” (Notes, xlv. 23—25. 18—21, v. 21.) Thus the holy law of God is established in honour and authority, both as to its precept and sanction. In him, the righteous Servant, the Chosen of God, “his soul delighteth.” (Note, 1—4.) “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;” “he always did those things which pleased” the Father. This accords entirely with the New Testament, and with the scope of the prophecy. The Messiah is the grand subject of the chapter; and seems here intended, though not expressly named. (1 John iii. 16. Gr.) While the Jewish rulers and teachers blindly rejected and crucified him, as an opposer and violator of the divine law, God was “well pleased” on account of his righteousness, because he magnified the law, by his infinitely valuable obedience unto death, as well as by his holy doctrine: so that, for the sake of his righteousness and atonement, salvation was freely preached to the Jews first, and then to the Gentiles. And when the Jews put it from them, God “took pleasure for his righteousness’ sake, to magnify” and honour “his law,” by inflicting on them deserved punishment. This connects the verse with those which follow, and shews the whole chapter to be a regular and connected prediction of the coming of Christ, and the events which followed, in the conversion of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, without any direct reference to other events. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22—25. These verses evidently predict the punishment inflicted on the nation of Israel, for all their sins, but especially for obstinate enmity to Christ and the gospel. To avenge this crime Jerusalem was given up to the Romans; and the Jews have been robbed and spoiled, hunted as wild beasts into a snare, imprisoned, enslaved, and preyed upon, for nearly eighteen hundred years, without deliverer or avenger: whereas seventy years’ captivity expiated the national guilt of their idolatry; and the Lord delivered them, and restored them to their own land. (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.)—As the Jews, from age to age, read this chapter, the Lord calls upon them to reflect on their condition, and the cause and Author of it, and enquires, “who among them will hearken for the time to come.” Nor can they assign any other reason for their long-continued miseries, except the hot displeasure of JEHOVAH; nor any so evident cause of that hot displeasure, as their rejection of the promised Messiah. But though he has thus “poured upon them the fury of his anger,” is become their tremendous enemy, and consumes them with his fiery indignation; yet they “know not, and lay it not to heart!” and their insensibility forms as striking a demonstration of the truth of the scripture, as their desolate and unprecedented situation. (Notes, 18—20. Hos. vii. 8—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

All the deliverers of God’s people, and all his servants, have been subjects, and many of them types, of his “beloved Son” and “elect Servant, whom he upholdeth, and in whom he delighteth.”—Would we make our “calling and election sure,” and have the Father delight over us for good; we must behold and hear, believe and obey, Christ: “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: hear ye him:” we must come through his mediation, receive from his fulness, and be directed by him in the ways of truth and righteousness. May he, without failure or delay, place judgment in the earth, and bring all the nations under the sun to welcome his salvation, and “wait for his law.”—Whilst his lowliness and compassion cheer our drooping hearts, and animate our feeble efforts to serve him, with the assurance that he will accept, assist, and comfort the feeblest and most distressed of those who believe in him; we should copy his example, and avoid all harshness and ostentation; we should learn to pity the tempted, to “strengthen the weak hands, to confirm the feeble knees, and comfort those that are of a fearful heart;” not being discouraged, or led to give up useful designs, because of obstacles and ill-treatment; “not weary of well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.”—How gracious was the Lord, the eternal Creator and Governor of the world, when instead of sending a powerful avenger among his rebellious creatures, he commissioned his beloved Son to be our Surety, and to mediate a new covenant of peace for all those who believe in him; and to bring poor blinded and enslaved sinners of the Gentiles, into the glorious liberty and marvellous light of his gospel! How great is his wisdom in rendering this merciful salvation honourable to his justice, and the grand, or indeed the exclusive method of effecting and maintaining godliness and holiness on earth! May his Spirit attend his word to open the eyes of sinners in every place, and to turn them “from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God” and righteousness: and surely we should consider our abilities, wealth, or influence to be best laid out, in promoting that blessed cause, for which the Redeemer shed his precious blood; that God in all things may be glorified, and that idolatry, and impiety, and wickedness may be suppressed and exterminated. We have now no reason to expect more prophecies; but we enjoy the benefit of that accumulated evidence, which arises from the completion of former prophecies from age to age. Let us then abound in songs of praise, even in “this isle of the sea,” the extensive navigation of which never brought over so rich a freight, as when it landed the scriptures, and the preachers of the gospel, on our shores; for at that time this country was more devoid of spiritual knowledge and grace, than the scorched plains of Kedar ever were of vegetable treasures. Let then the Redeemer's name resound through our cities, villages, plains, and mountains; and let our merchants and sailors give glory to the Lord, and declare his praise, and concur their efforts, with that of all the other inhabitants of our island, in conveying the same inestimable treasure, to all those, who yet “sit in darkness and the shadow of death, to guide their feet into the way of peace.”

Alas! iniquity and infidelity still abound, and Satan is permitted to deceive the nations of the world. For a long time JEHOVAH has held his peace; and his enemies exult in the hope that they shall triumph over his gospel; but their consternation will equal their anguish, when he shall appear to confound and destroy them, and to desolate whole nations, which have sinned in defiance of his word.—All his saints in heaven and on earth will acknowledge, that he “brought them when blind in a way that they knew not.” He met them with his word, when they were not seeking after him: he sent his ministers to their neighbourhood, perhaps against their will; or, he led them, in providence, while pursuing worldly things, to the places where his gospel was preached: and at length he conquered their prejudices and opened their eyes. Then he led them in paths of truth and peace, and sometimes of trial and temptation, to which they were utter strangers: but he still “made darkness light before them, and crooked things straight:” he cleared up their doubts, obviated their perplexities, helped them to surmount obstacles, and did them good by all their troubles; and thus gave them daily proof, that he would never leave or forsake them, either in temptation, in death, or judgment; when all the worshippers of idols and workers of iniquity shall be confounded together.—But alas! how many professed Christians, and nominal ministers, are more blind, than even the benighted heathens! so that, whilst the voice of God causeth “the deaf to hear and the blind to see;” those who think they do see, and are proud of their knowledge and virtue, are given up to judicial blindness and obstinacy; and all instruction and arguments tend to increase their enmity and guilt. Whilst the Lord is well pleased in saving sinners, through the righteousness of Christ; he will also take pleasure in glorifying his justice, by punishing such proud despisers: indeed the present condition of the Jews is a warning to all such as oppose the gospel. Who then, among them, or among us, “will hearken for the time to come?” And, seeing he has thus poured out his indignation on that once favoured people, for their sins; let us lay it to heart, and “fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of us should be found to come short of it.” (Notes, Heb. ii. 1—4. iv. 1, 2. xii. 22—25.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 1, 2. (Note, xlii. 22—25.) From the conclusion of the preceding chapter, the pious remnant in Israel might have inferred, that the Lord was about finally to cast off the whole nation. But he here assures them, that, having created them, formed them into a people, redeemed them from their enemies, called them by the name of Israel, (“a prince of God,”) to be his own inheritance; he would still shew them special favours: even as if, by his powerful presence with them, they should pass through seas and rivers; nay, through raging fires, without harm or danger. Accordingly, the nation being preserved, through all the ravages of the Chaldean invasion and through the captivity, was again restored to prosperity: even the desolations which attended and followed the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, did not consume it; but the Jews have been kept distinct from other nations to this day, notwithstanding their dispersions, and the massacres and oppressions to which they have been continually exposed. (Notes, 5—7. xli. 10—14. Num. xxiii. 9. Jer. xxx. 10, 11.) This is as marvellous an effect of JEHOVAH's power, as if they had passed through vehement flames unscorched, or dry shod through rivers and seas. (Note, Ps. lxvi. 11, 12.)—This seems to be the prophetic meaning; as a promise it ensures the preservation of true believers, through all possible trials and temptations.—“God's elect are called “the work of his hands;” (xxix. 23. lx. 21;) and these God will never utterly forsake. (Ps. cxxxviii. 8.)’ Lowth.

V. 3, 4. When Egypt was desolated, that Israel might be liberated, Egypt was given for the ransom of Israel. Sennacherib was taken off from besieging Jerusalem, by successful wars against the Egyptians and Ethiopians: and these nations, when vanquished by Cyrus, might be considered as a ransom paid him for the release of the Jews. Or, in general, when the preservation of Israel required the ruin of any nation, the Lord readily gave it up for their sakes. Before he had publicly testified his special regard for them, they were base and contemptible, but his favour rendered them honourable among the nations; and he would persevere in his love, and continue to give the same proofs of it, as heretofore.—‘I will not spare any man, rather than thou shouldest perish; for God more esteemeth one of his faithful, than all the wicked in the world.’—‘I will give man for thee;’ Adam in the singular number. The clause is thus literally rendered in the old version.—‘The second Man,’ (or Adam,) ‘is the Lord from heaven:’ and ‘God spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all.’

V. 5—7. The Jews were scattered by the Chaldeans into different regions; and the Israelites were carried by the Assyrians into divers lands: but these were professedly the sons and daughters of the Lord, and called by his name; and the Jews were gradually gathered from their captivity to Jerusalem and Judah. Yet it does not appear that many of them were brought from the west, or the south, on that occasion; or that they were generally new created to holiness, and prepared to glorify God, as it is here implied. (Notes, 1, 2. 14—21, v. 21. xi. 11—16. lxiii. 16—19. lxvi. 19—23.) But the conversion of sinners in every quarter of the globe, to be through Christ the children of God; and the future conversion of the dispersed Israelites and Jews to Christianity, and restoration to their own land, seem to be predicted. (Notes, John xi. 49—53. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) It is undeniable, from the application of the name of Babylon in the New Testament, that the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity was typical of the deliverance of the church from antichristian tyranny: and, probably, the destruction of the seat of Antichrist will be followed by the conversion of the Jews: as the taking of Babylon by Cyrus preceded their release from captivity; and that proud city from that time began to decay, till it was “swept with the besom of destruction.” ‘The conversion of the Jews, and the bringing the fullness of the Gentiles into the church, will be coincident in time; and each of these events will help to advance, and carry on the other. lxvi. 12. 19.’ Lowth. (Note, Rom. xi. 25—32.)—‘I will bring all the true seed of Israel out of their spiritual captivity, from all the corners of the world; so as all, that belong to mine election, shall in Christ be gathered unto me.’ Bp. Hall.

V. 8—13. All idolaters and opposers of true religion, whether Jews or Gentiles, seem to be here addressed; they do not use their faculties and opportunities as they ought to do, but “have eyes and see not, ears and hear not:” or the idols, whom they stupidly worshipped, may be meant. Let all the images and their votaries assemble together, that the cause betwixt God and his rivals might be finally decided. Let witnesses be produced, to justify their idol-worship: which of them could, like JEHOVAH, previously declare his purposes, and predict “what first should come to pass:” if none of them could do this, let them hear the word of God, and say, that it is truth, and that he alone ought to be worshipped. For the Jews were witnesses for God, and so was his servant the prophet, (or, as some think, the Messiah,) that he thus predicted future events, and interposed to deliver his people: the whole history of the nation abundantly evidenced these things, and was suited to convince all mankind that JEHOVAH was the only true God. None of the false gods were formed before him, nor could any, at all worthy of that title, be ever found after him: nay, he alone is the LORD, the self-existent God, and there is no Saviour beside him. (Notes, xli. 21—24. xlii. 8, 9. 18—20. Ex. iii. 14. Matt. xviii. 19, 20. xxviii. 19, 20. John viii. 54—59. Tit. ii. 13, 14. Rev. i. 7, 8. 12—20, v. 17. ii. 8, 9.)—When we recollect that Christ repeatedly used the word “I am,” or “I am he,” especially when he said, “Before Abraham was, I AM;” when we consider how frequently he is called Lord, and God, that he received the worship of saints and angels, and that he is emphatically “our Saviour,” “the Author of eternal salvation;” we shall not doubt, that he is one with the Father in the unity of the Godhead: otherwise it will not be easy, or even possible, to reconcile those passages in the New Testament with this decided language.—JEHOVAH had declared his purposes, wrought miraculous deliverances for Israel, and shewed future events, when there was no strange god among them, to whom the honour could be given: therefore they were competent to testify for him, that he was the omniscient, omnipotent God. But indeed he had been from eternity, and none could deliver out of his hand, or hinder his accomplishing his purposes and predictions.—This challenge would have a peculiar propriety and emphasis, after the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon: but how wonderful will these predictions appear to mankind, when they shall see them accomplished in the conversion of the nation of Israel to God our only Saviour, whom they have so long rejected; and then reinstated in the holy land.

V. 14—21. The deliverance from Babylon is here primarily predicted; but the language soon becomes so elevated and energetick, that it must refer to far greater events. Israel's holy Redeemer, out of love to them, sent the Medes and Persians to take Babylon, and to abase their nobles, (or to destroy the bars of their gates, Marg.) and those who gloried and confided in their ships. Babylon was well situated for navigation, till the channels of the Euphrates and Tigris were purposely obstructed, and rendered impassable for ships, after Cyrus had taken that city. Babylon was, when Isaiah wrote, only becoming considerable; and the Chaldeans were an obscure people.—JEHOVAH had long ago divided the sea, and destroyed the power of Egypt, to deliver Israel: but these former deliverances would scarcely be worthy of remembrance, when compared with what he was about to do for them. (Note, Jer. xxiii. 7, 8.) Yet the deliverance from Egypt was attended with far greater wonders, than the restoration of the Jews from Babylon: but the redemption of Christ, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the restoration of Israel into the church, may well be considered as far more glorious events. The emblems here used have already been explained. (Notes, xxx. 23—25. xxxv. 5—10. xli. 17—20.)—“The image is...highly poetical. God will give such an abundant miraculous supply of water, ... that the wild beasts, the serpents, the ostriches, and other animals that haunt those adust regions, shall be sensible of the blessing; and shall break forth into thanksgiving and praises to him, for the unusual refreshment, which they receive from his so plentifully watering the sandy wastes of Arabia, ... for the benefit of his people passing through them.” Bp. Lowth.—As the Lord forms believers by his grace to shew forth his praise; so the nation of Israel seems to have been constituted on purpose, that he might manifest to the world, his wisdom, justice, power, truth, and mercy, in his dealings with them through every age.—“This people have I purchased,” (or made peculiarly mine,) “that they may shew forth my praises.” Sept. This language so much resembles that of St. Peter, that it is evident he referred to it in these words, “Ye are ... a peculiar people, that ye should shew forth the praises of him, who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light:” (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10:) including the Gentile converts; yet so as to predict also the restoration of the nation of Israel: and this shews, that true believers of whatever nation, are the Israel to whom these promises are specially addressed. (Notes, 5—7. Ps. c. 3. 2 Cor. v. 17—21.)

V. 22—25. The Israelites were always disposed to forsake the worship of JEHOVAH, as weary of his service: the lambs, kids, and other cattle which he claimed for sacrifice, were either withheld, or offered in a dishonourable manner. He had not laid on them such injunctions as could injure them: nor would he have insisted on their offerings and incense, if they had not been able to pay them. Indeed, in some part of the reign of Ahaz, and at other times, they seem to have been totally omitted. But, instead of expending their wealth in purchasing spices, sweet ointments, and oblations for the house of God; they used the bounty of his kind providence in committing iniquity, and even wearied out his patience by their rebellion. So that all the mercies which they had received, and that complete forgiveness which he revealed and promised, (blotting out their sins as a cancelled debt, and making no more mention of them than if he had quite forgotten them,) must be allowed to be wholly unmerited, the fruit of his abundant grace, for his own glory; and not any thing due to them for their good behaviour, but notwithstanding their aggravated provocations. (Notes, i. 10—15. Ps. l. 7—15. Jer. vii. 21—23. Am. v. 21—27.)—The language, however, far more exactly describes the state of the Jews, for ages past, in which neither sacrifice nor incense have been offered, and during which they have persisted in obstinate rebellion: and yet, ere long, “for his own name’s sake,” JEHOVAH will blot out their sins, and restore them to his church, and to their own land. (Note, Ez. xvi. 60—63. xxxvi. 25—36.)

V. 26—28. If either Judah or Israel could deny this charge, let them remind God of their good works, and plead with him, declaring on what ground they expected to be continued in his special favour, and to be justified before him. But indeed their remote ancestors, from Adam to that time, and their high priests, chief rulers, and teachers especially, had combined in transgression: and therefore God had treated them as if they were heathen, notwithstanding their external relation to him and his sanctuary; and had given up the nation, as accursed, to be every where reproached, and treated with contempt.—I ‘have suffered the Babylonians to profane the sanctuary, ‘to abuse the chief priests, and pollute whatever is sacred. ‘xlvii. 6. Lam. ii. 6, 7. iv. 14.’ Lowth.—Their king, also, the anointed of the Lord, of David’s line, might be intended. (Marg. Ref.)—The prophecy, however, certainly had its most signal fulfilment in the combination of the high priest, chief priests, scribes, and rulers against Christ; and in the rejected and disgraced state of the nation, with its rulers and teachers, to this day. But, as of mere mercy, their national guilt was formerly pardoned, and they were brought back from Babylon; so the Lord, of the same abounding grace, will bring the nation to repentance and faith in Christ, and glorify himself in blotting out all their transgressions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

If we are not only called by the name of the Lord our Creator and Redeemer, but are really partakers of his grace, and aim to live to his glory; we can have no just cause to fear any thing, that can befall ourselves, the church, or the world. We may meet with hot fires of tribulation and persecution, during our pilgrimage; we may pass through deep waters of temptation, and we must cross the Jordan of death: but the Lord will be with us; and no fire can injure us, no waters drown us, with him for our Guard, our Upholder, and our Comforter. He has done far more for us, than when he gave Egypt for the ransom of Israel; for he has “given his only begotten Son to be the propitiation for our sins:” and though in ourselves we were exceedingly base and vile; yet this great ransom of the Holy One of Israel our Saviour has dignified our species, and shewn the value of our souls: and when the grace of the Holy Spirit manifests that we are precious in the sight of the Lord, and the objects of his special love, we are ennobled, enriched, and made honourable, as “kings and priests unto him.” Then, whatever endangers the life of our souls shall be removed; and all that can be wanting shall be supplied: for as “he hath not spared his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him freely give us all things?” (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39.)—The most powerful princes and empires are as nothing before God, when compared with his church. For all true believers are “the seed of Israel,” “the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty:” when he calls, they must be given up, and cannot be withheld by the powers of darkness, from coming to him from all the ends of the earth: and he will new create them for his glory, and be honoured in them and by them to all eternity.—But alas! many, who are favoured with the word of God, are as blind and deaf as the most stupid idolaters, or their senseless images; and they only use their senses and faculties to ensure their own condemnation! But none will be more justly brought forth to punishment, than the advocates of false religion in preference to divine revelation.—Let the whole world assemble, and endeavour to form such a book as the Bible, if they can: let them match the prophecies which are contained in it, and fulfilled from age to age, to authenticate its sacred truths and holy precepts: let them produce their witnesses, and see whether they can be justified at the bar of unprejudiced reason, before they appear before the tribunal of God. Or, if they cannot do this, let them hear his word, acknowledge its truth, and yield obedience to it. Every servant of God is a witness for him, and concurs in the testimony of his prophets and apostles, and in that of his beloved Son: and they all can give such an account of what he has wrought in them, shewn to them, and done for them, as may tend to lead others to know, believe, and understand, his power, truth, and love. He only is “the true God and eternal life:” he saves his people by himself, and needs no created aid; and the help which he sends, in answer to their prayers, enables them to testify, that “he never faileth those who trust in him.”

V. 14—28.

As none can deliver the enemies of God out of his hand; so none can hinder him from effecting the deliverance of his friends. It is as easy for him to divide rivers and seas, and to destroy the legions which obstruct their path, as to quench the fire in tow. But external miracles are as nothing compared with that great work and “mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh,” “purchasing the church with his own blood.” These “things the angels desire to look down into.” And all that remains to be done, in order to bring every believer to glory, to rescue sinners from the bondage of Satan, and to cause the heathen to rejoice in glorifying God our Saviour, is little, compared with that work of incomprehensible love and power. Let us then bless God for the waters which spring forth for us, in this barren wilderness, and let us endeavour to answer the end of our creation and redemption, by shewing forth his praises.—But, alas! too many professed Christians love a cheap and easy religion: and are negligent or weary of every duty, and grudge all expense or trouble; nay, they weary God by their iniquities and rebellions. Indeed he may well expostulate with each of us. We allow his service to be perfect freedom; that he has a right to all we have and are; and that he requires of us nothing, but for our own and each other's profit: yet often we neglect to call upon him, or seem weary of his ordinances; we are scanty in our measure of services, as if we grudged him our time; we often grieve his Holy Spirit, and weary out his patience with our relapses into sin, and our ingratitude and folly: so that, from first to last, he “blotteth out our transgressions for his own sake,” and not because we have any claim to such a benefit. If any man imagine himself an exception to this rule, let him draw near and plead his cause, and declare on what grounds he rests his hope of being justified. Alas! the attempt is desperate: our first father transgressed the covenant, and we all, teachers and rulers as well as others, have copied his example of rebellion: and if we should all be left under his curse, and to everlasting reproach and misery, we could have nothing to answer or plead in our own behalf. But “where sin hath abounded, grace hath much more abounded.” Yet let none “sin on, that grace may abound:” we have no reason to expect pardon, except we seek it by faith in Christ; and this is always attended by deep repentance, and followed by newness of life, from hatred of sin, and love to God our Saviour.

(Notes, xxxii. 15—20. xli. 17—20.) When any of the descendants of Israel, through revolving ages, thirst for spiritual blessings, this promise is ready in their scriptures for their direction and encouragement. As a prediction it has been accomplished as often, as true religion has been revived: but it seems particularly to predict the pouring out of the Spirit on, and immediately after, the day of Pentecost; and a still more glorious completion may yet be expected, both in respect of Jews and Gentiles.—When desires are excited and fervent prayers offered, for “the pouring out of the Spirit” on any place, where the power of godliness has been little experienced and witnessed, the blessing may be expected; and converts will spring up as grass in well watered meadows, or as willows on the banks of rivers and brooks; and these will dedicate themselves to the Lord, as his servants and worshippers, setting their hands and seals to the new covenant of his grace, and joining themselves to his people, to walk in holy fellowship with them. (Note, Deut. xxvi. 17—19.)—Some think, that the phrase, “subscribe with his hand unto the LORD,” signifies bearing his name, as belonging to him: thus soldiers are said to have been marked in the hand with the name of their leader, slaves with that of their owner, and idolaters with that of their idol. (Note, Rev. xiii. 13—17.)

V. 6—8. Israel’s Redeemer and King, the everlasting JEHOVAH, and the only living and true God, here again challenges the idols and their worshippers to call forth, and to declare in order before him, a series of predictions similar to that which he had given and been accomplishing, since he appointed to the ancient inhabitants of the earth their several abodes; and to shew the things, which should come to pass immediately, or in distant periods. By “the ancient people,” or “the people of eternity,” Israel seems to be meant, as the type of the elect, whom “God hath from the beginning chosen unto salvation.”—“He chose Abraham and his family to be his peculiar people; over whom he hath all along exercised a particular providence; and hath from time to time foreshewed what should befall them, which accordingly hath come to pass.”

Lowth. Indeed a compendious history of that nation from the calling of Abraham to this day, (that is, for three thousand seven hundred years,) might be drawn up, without very material alterations, from the various prophecies concerning them contained in the scriptures.—As then Israel had full proof, that their God alone could do such wonders, they ought not either to worship idols, or to fear idolaters. They were witnesses for God, that he had from ancient times declared the events which had come to pass; and he appealed to them, whether there were any God beside him, or any other Rock, or Protector, who could defend them: for He, who knew all things, knew not any.—Let any serious mind compare this decisive language, with the tenour of the New Testament concerning Jesus Christ; and he must perceive that it is necessary to admit the mystery of distinct persons in the Godhead, in order to reconcile them. (Marg. Ref. s, t, u.—Notes, ix. 6, 7. xli. 2—4. xliii. 8—13. Rev. i. 8—11. ii. 8, 9.)

V. 9—11. The subsequent passage contains the most keen reproof of idolatry, and even invective against it, that is any where extant. The makers of graven images must be very vanity and emptiness, when the objects of their supreme confidence and delight, formed by themselves, were utterly worthless: the very idols sufficiently bare witness to the folly and wickedness of their votaries; as it was evident, that they could neither see nor know any thing: and this should have rendered every intelligent being ashamed of worshipping a lifeless block for a deity. Indeed, all concerned in making or worshipping them, would at length be ashamed of their folly. The artists themselves were “of Adam;” weak, dying men: how then could they confer power and divinity on their workmanship? Can a dying man make a living God? and though they should all gather together to support their cause, they would be intimidated and confounded before the God of Israel. (Notes, Dan. iii. v. 1—9. 18—24. Hab. ii. 18—20.)—The clause rendered “they are their own witnesses,” may be translated, “they” (that is, the idols, the immediate antecedent,) are “witnesses to them.”

12 ¹The smith with ^{}the tongs both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers, and worketh it with the strength of his arms: ^{}yea, he is hungry, and his strength faileth; he drinketh no water, and is faint.

13 The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; ¹he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man; ^mthat it may remain in the house.

14 He ⁿheweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he [†]strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest: he planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it.

15 Then shall it be for a man to burn; for he will take thereof and warm himself; yea, he kindleth it, and baketh bread; yea, ^ohe maketh a god, and worshippeth it; he maketh it a graven image, and falleth down thereto.

V. 12—17. The process of image-making is here described, in order to expose the folly of idolaters. The smith exhausted his strength, and would not allow himself time for rest or refreshment, in cutting, hammering out, and fashioning his idol; which after all could not preserve him from fainting or perishing by hunger and thirst.—The carpenter, in his way too, employed his strength and skill in forming an idol of wood, to set up in his house as the object of his adoration; though it was as senseless as the meanest part of his furniture, and far more useless. In order to be prepared to serve his neighbours with this strange manufacture, he provided a large stock of several kinds of timber, selecting that which grew most strong and straight; and even planting ash-trees, and waiting their growth, for this purpose. And when the boughs and chips, and other parts of it, had been used for fuel; he was so absurd, as to make his deity of the same log, to prostrate himself before it, and to pray unto it, saying, “Deliver me, for thou art my god!” That which warmed him and cooked his food, though the refuse, was useful; but that which made the image was good for nothing, nay, an abomination! (Notes, xl. 18—20. xli. 5—7. xlii. 5—9. Jer. x. 3—11.)—We are not to conclude that all the idolaters were so stupid, as to terminate their adoration upon the lifeless image; for some of the heathen poets acutely derided the folly of those who did so. Yet the practice naturally led the unthinking multitude to adore the idol itself. And the invisible object, which a few conceived to be present with it, and to be represented by it, was commonly as much the creature of their imagination, as the other was the work of their hands. In every way God was dishonoured and robbed of his worship, and Satan was gratified as the object of their adoration.—The history of popery shews, that similar effects have uniformly followed the use of images; whether as representing the saints and angels which the people invoke as mediators, or as representing the persons in the sacred Trinity.—A heathen poet ludicrously puts these words into the mouth of an image. ‘I was of old the trunk of a fig-tree, a block of useless wood; when the carpenter, uncertain whether to make a bench or a Priapus, chose that I should be a god!’ Horace.—‘When therefore does it become a god? Behold it is cast, fashioned, and carved! It is not yet a god.—It is sodered, put together, and set up! Neither is it yet a god.—Behold it is adorned, consecrated, and prayed to! then at length it is a god, when men have chosen and dedicated it.’ Minutius Felix.

V. 18. The effect is here mentioned, but the agent is not assigned. Satan “blinds the minds of unbelievers” by means of their corrupt passions, especially their enmity to the holy perfections, truth, and worship of God: and his agency is one grand cause of those absurd reasonings, sentiments, and practices, disparaging to the human understanding, of which the most sensible men are capable in matters of religion. But he only acts, as permitted by God, who gives up obstinate transgressors to judicial blindness and obduracy, so that they cannot see nor understand.—‘God hath, in his just judgment, given them up to a strange besottedness, ... so as, though they have both hearts and eyes, they cannot understand.’ *Bp. of nutriment, if eaten as bread, but very prejudicial: thus idolatry, is not only useless, but ruinous to the soul. (Notes, Prov. xv. 14. Hos. xii. 1, 2.) And whether men seek happiness in worldly things, or run into infidelity, superstition, pharisaism, enthusiasm, or any false system of religion, the case is similar; as they seek support to their souls from that, which indeed will prove the cause of their destruction. A heart, deceived by pride, love of sin and of the world, carnal self-love in every form, and alienation from God, turns men thus aside from him: and whilst the affections are depraved, a man cannot detect his own error, or deliver his own soul; but he holds the lie fast in his right hand, as his treasure, his wisdom, his protection. (Notes, xxviii. 14, 15. 17-19. 1 Kings xxii. 19-23. 2 Chr. xxv. 14-16.)

V. 22. (Notes, xliii. 22-28.) God had repeatedly pardoned the sins of Israel. When their transgressions impended over them, as a threatening storm, apparently about to burst in vengeance on their heads, he had scattered them as the wind disperses the black clouds: and therefore they should be encouraged to return to him as their Redeemer. This seems especially to refer to the case of the Jews, during the captivity, and in their present dispersion; and it implies a promise of pardon and deliverance, as well as an exhortation to repentance.—In that redemption, of which the deliverances of Israel were types, provision is made for the free and full pardon of all that believe; and the proclamation of this by the gospel excites and encourages sinners to return to God. But it would be absurd to argue, from the arrangement of a single sentence, contrary to the whole tenour of scripture, that eth all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; 25 That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish; 26 That confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers; that saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built, and I will raise up the decayed places thereof; 27 That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers; 28 That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid.

(Notes, xxxv. 1, 2. xlii. 10-12. Ps. xcvi. 11-13. xcvi. 3-9. xcvi. 7-9.)—The future restoration of Israel, as a nation, seems also predicted, with that bringing in “the fulness of the Gentiles,” which will accompany or follow it. The deliverance from Babylon was merely a shadow of the redemption here foretold.

V. 24. Marg. Ref.—By myself.] The apostle says, that “God created all things by JESUS CHRIST:” “By whom also he made the worlds.” (Notes, John i. 1-3. Eph. iii. 9-12. Heb. i. 1, 2.)

V. 25-28. The God of Israel had often confounded the magicians and wise counsellors of his enemies: and in this case he determined to frustrate the expectations of all the Chaldean soothsayers and diviners; to prove them liars, and absolutely to infatuate them. (Notes, xix. 11-14. xlvii. 11-15. Jer. i. 35, 36. 1 Cor. i. 20-31. iii. 18-23.) He would expose the folly of all their wise men, when they could not read the hand-writing to Belshazzar, nor detect Cyrus’s device to take Babylon: and he would equally shame the politicians, when it was proved that they had used no suitable or effectual means of defence against the besiegers. (Notes, Dan. v. 5-9. 25-28.) At the same time he confirmed the word of his servant Isaiah, and performed every thing according to the information given by his messengers, the prophets, in bringing these events to pass. (Notes, xlii. 1—4.)—It should especially be noticed, that when this prophecy was delivered, Jerusalem and Judah were inhabited and at peace, and the temple was recently purified, and regularly frequented as the holy sanctuary of God. Yet it was intimated that the city and temple would be destroyed to the foundations; (which took place about a hundred and twenty years afterwards;) and that they should be rebuilt by orders from Cyrus, which happened about a hundred and seventy years after. (Note, lxiv. 9—12.) Cyrus, (the only man, except Josiah, predicted by name much above a hundred years before his birth, Notes, 1 Kings xiii. 2. 2 Kings xxiii. 15—20) was appointed to act as shepherd over the Lord's scattered flock. The promise, that Jerusalem should be inhabited, was to be fulfilled, by Cyrus giving orders for its being rebuilt, and the foundations of the temple laid: and the foundations were accordingly laid in his time, though it was not built till some time afterwards! (Notes, Ezra iii. 7—13. iv. 3—6. 17—24.)—The manner in which Babylon was taken was also foretold: the wide and deep river Euphrates, that ran through the city, was emptied into a vast lake, which had been prepared by the kings of Babylon to receive its superfluous waters; and Cyrus marched his army into the city by the channel of the river.—Probably this prophecy, shewn by Daniel to Cyrus, hastened the deliverance of the Jews. (Notes, xlv. 1—6. Ezra i. 1—4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

When the greater part of any church is become totally corrupt, and ripe for divine vengeance; there may yet be a few of another character: warnings and calamities may likewise bring a remnant to repentance, and encouragement must be given to them. For, however the Lord may deal with atrocious offenders, he will always have a company of chosen servants, who will hear his call and obey his voice. Having formed them to be upright in heart, he unites towards them the love of a Creator, and of a Redeemer; and he would have them discard those dejecting fears, which are often excited by his denunciations of wrath against hypocrites. To whatever regions Providence may lead them, his grace shall refresh their thirsty souls, and cause them to flourish as a watered garden. The blessed influences of the Spirit render the barren desert, and the dry ground, a fruitful field. May our souls, our families, our congregations, our land, and all the nations of the earth be abundantly replenished with it! then shall we abound in the fruits of righteousness, and believers will be daily added to the Lord.—He is ever ready to receive the sinner to mercy, and into his service; and nothing can hinder our being “his people, and he our God,” except our own proud and carnal unwillingness. But when his Spirit is who contended against his appointments, 7—14. The prophet adores his deep counsels, pronounces the confusion of idolaters, and assures Israel of salvation, 15—20. JEHOVAH reveals himself as “a just God and a Saviour;” and swears by himself, that all shall bow to him, and that Israel shall be justified and glory in him, 21—25.

poured out on any congregation or company, which was before formal and lifeless; one and another continually springs up, and comes forth, to profess his acceptance of the Saviour and subjection to him: this tends to enliven others, and a blessed change is soon perceived.—It behoves those, who have learned to hope in the mercy of God, and to love his pleasant ways, to make an open profession of their faith and willing devotedness to his service; solemnly to ratify the new covenant of his grace, and to avow their purpose of cleaving to him stedfastly; to join themselves to his people; to put themselves under the care of such “as watch for their souls,” and to seek the benefit of brotherly inspection and admonition. The Lord's supper, when properly administered and received, is suited to answer these ends: and new converts should not be slack in thus “subscribing with their hands unto the LORD, and “surnaming themselves by the name of Israel.”

V. 6—20.

Who can presume to compare himself with Israel's Redeemer and King? He is “the First and the Last;” he alone calls, and declares, and appoints, and orders every thing with absolute authority: his majesty and mercy are alike unrivalled: and, “beside him,” none is entitled to our worship, or deserving of our confidence.—As “God is “in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,” sinners coming “to God by him,” may be happy in his favour, rich by his bounty, and safe under his protection: but Satan so blinds the hearts of men, that they generally neglect and despise these blessings, for the sake of some senseless idolatry, worthless form, or base iniquity.—We may well be amazed at the absurdity of those unnumbered millions, who have worshipped “wood and stone, the work “of men's hands,” to the disgrace of their reason and understanding. Yet we should also be humbled; as we are equally capable of the same folly, though the blessed light of revelation has preserved most of us from the grosser effects of this propensity. But what multitudes are there, even among protestant Christians in Britain, whose characters and lives are vanity; whose “delectable things can “not profit;” and whose grovelling pursuits, polluting pleasures, and childish amusements, bear witness against them, and should cover them with shame! What numbers, whose religious principles and observances can no more abide scrutiny, or stand the test of scripture, or common sense, than those of the poor pagans! The object of their worship is an imaginary being; and they think of God, and behave towards him, as if he were altogether such a one as themselves: (Note, Ps. l. 16—21:) nay, they expect him to reward, with eternal felicity, such services as they would disdain, if imitated by any of their domesticks: a mere lip-labour, slovenly performed, belying the sentiments, and covering the enmity, of their hearts.—But sometimes men will even weary and deny themselves more in a false religion, than would be necessary in the service of God. Many of us likewise can remember a time, when we more abridged ourselves of rest and refreshment, in following our own humours and pleasures; than we now willingly do for the glory of God, and in attending on his ordinances. Indeed the earnestness, assiduity, perseverance, and self-denial of worldly or superstitious men, may put believers to shame; when they consider how far they are surpassed by those, who act from motives so immensely inferior, and for such worthless acquisitions. (Notes, Luke xvi. 1—8. P. O. 1—12. Note, 1 Cor. ix. 24—27.) The absurdity and madness of man can never be accounted for; except we advert to the power of Satan to shut his eyes and his heart, that he cannot know nor understand; and recollect that the Lord often sends men “strong delusions to believe a lie,” because they hate the truth through love of sin. In this way they are brought “to feed upon ashes;” their deceived hearts turn them aside from truth and holiness: and they are so fettered by their lusts, that they cannot deliver their souls, nor discover that they are holding fast a lie in their right-hand. It is awful to think how many are in this situation: they make an evident error their first principle of activity, and will neither be convinced, nor persuaded to doubt of the truth of their favourite mistake: they cling to it most closely when most alarmed, and grasp it fast in the hour of death, and go into eternity with it in their right hand. Oh, may we remember these things, and take care not to provoke God, by sinning in defiance of conviction, to give us up to be thus blinded and deceived! Let us pray for the illuminating and renewing influences of his Holy Spirit, that we may be formed to be his servants; and that he would give us “the love of the truth, that we may be “saved;” and thus secure us from every delusion, and assure us that we shall never be forgotten by him.

V. 21—28.

The manifold transgressions of all men, as fallen children of Adam, were risen or rising into a thick and black cloud, and vengeance was about to burst on their heads: but the sacrifice of Christ has caused this cloud to vanish, and we are now without exception called and commanded to return to the LORD, for “he hath redeemed us.” Let us then obey the gracious call, and avail ourselves of this abundant mercy; that we may join the songs of the inhabitants of heaven and earth, in praising the Lord, that he has done this, and has glorified himself in the redemption of his people. How should we exult and triumph at the thought, that he “who stretched forth the heavens “alone, and spread abroad the earth by himself,” is become our gracious Redeemer!—He will indeed “confound the wisdom of the wise, and turn them backward, and make their “knowledge foolish:” and above all he will put to shame false teachers and deceivers, whom Satan employs to support idolatry, impiety, infidelity, or false religion. But he will confirm the word and approve the counsel of his faithful ministers: and when his promises and threatenings shall be completely performed, those, who now despise his worshippers and messengers, will then perceive their wisdom and happiness. He, that “knoweth the end from the “beginning,” has given commandment to replenish Jerusalem, to erect his spiritual temple, and to repair the decayed places of his church. A nobler Shepherd than Cyrus is commissioned to gather together his scattered flock, and to feed and protect them in his fold: and he will do all the Father’s pleasure, till his work be fully completed. As he has removed obstacles, and raised up instruments to fulfil former prophecies, so will he do, in respect of all which yet remain to be accomplished; until the top-stone of his temple be brought forth “with shoutings, crying, Grace, “grace, unto it.” (Note, Zech. iv. 4—7.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XLV. V. 1—6. The Lord here addressed Cyrus, as if present: he was the anointed of God, as he was set apart for this work, and as in some respects a type of Christ our Redeemer. Cyrus, being “holden by the right-“hand,” and strengthened by the Lord, would certainly be victorious. (Note, xli. 10—14.) JEHOVAH subdued many other nations before him, previously to his conquest of Babylon: and he degraded or enfeebled many kings by him; Belshazzar especially was thus intimidated before he was destroyed. (Notes, xxi. 3—5. Dan. v. 1—9.) All the streets of Babylon, which led down on each side to the river, were secured by two-leaved brazen gates: these were ordered to be shut every night: and when Cyrus marched his army into the channel of the river, he could not, without great danger and difficulty, have taken the city; had not the Babylonians, (engaged that night in feasting and mirth, and despising his efforts,) left the gates open. Thus God "opened before him the two-leaved gates;" or what was equivalent, he took care that they "should not be shut:" and so Cyrus and his captains and army met with no hindrance, till they surprised the king in his palace, and by his death ended the contest at once. (Notes, Jer. li. 31, 32. 38—40. Dan. v. 30, 31.) Indeed the Lord went before him, through his whole expedition, to remove every obstacle to his success: (Note, xl. 3—5:) he broke before him the gates of brass and bars of iron, which obstructed his entrance into the various cities that he besieged; and he gave him immense treasures, which had long been reposed in dark and secret places, so that his spoil is said to have amounted to above a hundred and twenty millions sterling.—The exact fulfilment of these prophecies was intended to convince Cyrus, that "the God of Israel," who had called him by name, surnamed him "his shepherd" and "his anointed," and girded him with strength, when he was an entire stranger to him, was indeed the only true God. (Note, Ezra i. 1—4.) This was for the sake of Israel, his chosen servant, and in order to effect his release, and to make known to the most distant regions, that there was no other God but JEHOVAH. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xlv. 6—8.)

V. 7. The Magians, whose religion chiefly prevailed in the east, held, that there were two co-eternal, co-ordinate beings, of whom they thought the light and darkness to be proper emblems, the one the author of all good, the other of all evil; that these were continually opposing each other; and that from this contest, that mixture and interchange of good and evil, which prevail on earth, originated. This was indeed a very absurd opinion: yet it was a natural conclusion from a careful observation of the state of the world, by those, who were wholly unacquainted with the cause, and the cure, of the evils which abound on every side. But in opposition to this opinion, JEHOVAH here declared, both light and darkness, good and evil, to be his creatures: (Marg. Ref.) that is, There is no being in the universe independent of him; all are his creatures and instruments, either acting at his command or by his permission. He is positively the Author of all that is true, holy, good, or happy in the universe: and evil, error, and misery came into the world by his permission, through the wilful apostasy of his creatures; but are so restrained and over-ruled by him, as to concur in fulfilling his wise and righteous purposes; and cannot possibly exceed the bounds which he assigns them, or defeat any of his plans, or create him any disquietude or disappointment. (Notes, Ps. lxxv. 10. Prov. xvi. 4. Am. iii. 4—8, v. 6. Jam. i. 13

9 ¶ Woe 'unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth.

"Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?

10 Woe unto him that 'saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?

—18.) 'Dr. Prideaux hath given a clear account of this sentence: 'These words,' saith he, 'being directed to 'Cyrus king of Persia, must be understood as spoken to 'the Persian sect of the Magians, who held Light and 'Darkness, Good and Evil, to be supreme Beings, without acknowledging the great God, who is superior to 'them both.'—In opposition to this opinion, the prophet instructs king Cyrus, that Light and Darkness, Good and Evil, are under the direction and disposal of Almighty 'God.' Lowth.

V. 8. It has before been observed, that spiritual blessings are often predicted under the veil of temporal deliverances; and that in this case, sometimes the external sign is more immediately intended, and sometimes the thing signified. (Notes, xl. 1, 2. xli. 17—20.) In the preceding verses the deliverance from Babylon was immediately predicted; but in this verse, and in the remainder of this chapter, the blessings of salvation are chiefly intended.—At the word of JEHOVAH, the great first Cause of all, "the heavens would drop down from above," yea, pour out plenteous showers of righteousness, to water and fructify the earth: and the earth would open to receive the gracious showers, and would in consequence yield an abundant increase of salvation and righteousness. (Notes, Ps. lxxxv. 1—3. 9—13.) Some partial fulfilment of this took place in the revival of true religion, which attended the return of the Jews from Babylon: but the redemption of sinners by the incarnate Son of God, and the pouring out of the Spirit to give success to the gospel, must principally be intended.—When the eternal Son came down from heaven to save sinners, "the heavens dropped down righteousness;" and the earth, where he took his human nature, in which he magnified the law, satisfied justice, and finished his work, "brought forth salvation." When, after his exaltation in heaven, the Holy Spirit was poured out, and by his influence numbers of sinners were converted, saved, and made fruitful in all good works; then "the skies "poured down righteousness," the earth received the blessed communication, and brought forth salvation and righteousness together: and the whole was the work of the wisdom, power, holiness, truth, and mercy of God our Creator. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxii. 15. xlv. 3—5. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31.)—'Justice and salvation, mercy and truth, 'righteousness and peace, and glory dwelling in the land, 'cannot with any sort of propriety, ... be interpreted as the 'consequences of that event;' (the return of the Jews from Babylon;) 'they must mean the blessings of the great redemption by Messiah.' Bp. Lowth.

V. 15—17. Truly the God and Saviour of Israel hides himself, and his gracious counsels and designs, under an impenetrable veil; so that it cannot be known what his intentions are, until the event declare them: seeing the Babylonish captivity, and other most calamitous dispensations, were designed to make way for the enlargement of the church, and the increase of her purity and honour. It should therefore at length appear, that all idolaters would be confounded together, and all the true Israel of God be saved with an everlasting salvation, by means of their union with the everlasting JEHOVAH; and that they would never be ashamed of their confidence, through all generations and to all eternity. (Notes, xlv. 9—11. Ps. xcvi.
3—7. Jer. ii. 26—30. x. 11—15. Zeph. ii. 11. iii. 9—13.
18—20.)—' The reader cannot but observe the sudden ' transition from the solemn adoration of the secret and ' mysterious nature of God's counsels, in regard of his ' people, to the spirited denunciation of the confusion of ' idolaters, and the final destruction of idolatry; contrasted ' with the salvation of Israel, not from temporal captivity,
' but the eternal salvation by Messiah, strongly marked by
' the repetition and augmentation of the phrase, to the ages

' of eternity.' Bp. Lowth.—Israel must here mean the whole body of believers, as "of God, in CHRIST JESUS, who
" of God is made to them Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanc" tification, and Redemption." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, John xiv. 18—24. Rom. v. 3—5. 1 Cor. i. 26—31. Gal. vi. 15,

V. 18, 19. The Lord did not form the heavens and the earth to be empty and desolate, but in order to be occupied by their respective inhabitants: and in like manner none of his works are wrought in vain. He had not chosen Israel to cast him off again: he has not formed and accomplished his plan of redemption, without a purpose of replenishing his church with converts, and his heavenly mansions with inhabitants. He did not intend that the land of Judah and Jerusalem should always continue desolate. And his almighty power could effectually ensure his purposes, and perform his predictions. These were not spoken in secret; as the heathen oracles were uttered from some dark cavern, or retired recess, and in ambiguous language which shrunk from investigation: but they were open for every one to read, and obvious to every understanding. Nor ought it to be inferred, from the miseries which had come, or were about to come, on the nation of Israel, that God had commanded his people to seek him in vain, as the idolaters called on their idols to no purpose;
(Notes, 20—22, v. 20. 1 Kings xviii. 26—29;) for no Israelites ever walked in the steps of their believing progenitors, who failed of obtaining the covenanted blessings.
—Indeed, however men may object, the Lord always speaks righteousness, and gives sentence according to truth and equity; and his promises, decrees, threatenings, and judgments are entirely consistent; as it will appear at the day of judgment. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lv. 6, 7. 1 Chr. xvi.
10, 11. Matt. vii. 7—11.)

V. 20—22. JEHOVAH here addressed himself to the Gentiles, and he exhorted those of the several nations, which had escaped his judgments, and the sword of Cyrus,

to draw near unto him; that they might be instructed, and convinced of the folly and wickedness of praying to idols, which could not save them. They were required to inform one another of these events; to draw near to examine the predictions and the accomplishment of them; and to consult together, whether JEHOVAH alone had not declared these things "from ancient times:" that they might be convinced that there was no God beside him; a just Avenger of his enemies and rebellious subjects, and a merciful and powerful Saviour of those, who trust in and serve him: that so they might be induced to renounce their idolatry and iniquity, and to depend on him for salvation, from the remotest regions of the earth. 'This relates to the calling of the Gentiles, and especially to the bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles, at the end of the world. Rom. xi. 25. Matt. xxiv. 14.' Lowth.—As in Christ Jesus and his righteousness, atonement, and intercession, the justice and mercy of JEHOVAH are harmoniously displayed, and he is shewn to be "a just God and a Saviour;" as all the nations of the earth are invited, and commanded to look unto Jesus, Immanuel, that they may be saved; and as there are evident applications of the subsequent verses to Christ in the New Testament: so we cannot mistake in considering the eternal Son as speaking in this passage; who, with the Father and Holy Spirit, is our God and Saviour, and there is none beside. (Notes, xli. 1. 24—26. xliii. 8—13. xlv. 6—8.)—A just God, &c. (21) Notes, 23—25. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Zech. ix. 9, 10. Heb. vii. 1—3.—Look, &c. (22) Notes, Zech. xii. 9—14. John i. 29. iii. 4, 15. xii. 27—33, v. 32. Heb. xii. 1—3.

V. 23—25. JEHOVAH here solemnly swears by himself, that he will irrevocably perform the righteous and faithful word, which he had spoken. Nor shall his word "return:" (Note, lv. 10, 11 :) for assuredly, "every knee shall bow" in adoration and submission to him; and "every tongue shall confess" his name, and vow allegiance to him. (Note, Ps. ii. 10—12.) "Surely," shall each of them say, "In JEHOVAH have I righteousness and strength:" declaring all their righteousness to be in Christ, "the LORD our righteousness;" all their holy dispositions and righteous actions to spring from his sanctifying grace; and all their safety, support, inward strength, and outward protection, to be in and from him alone. To him, men shall come from every nation for these blessings; (Note, Gen. lix. 10;) all that are enraged at the honour paid to him and that hate his cause, shall be put to shame: (Note, liv. 5—17 :) and all believers, the true "seed of Israel," shall be accounted righteous, as one with him; and shall glory and rejoice in him, as their whole Salvation, their Friend, and Portion; as made of God the Father unto them, Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption." (Notes, 1 Cor. i. 26—31. 2 Cor. v. 18—21. Phil. ii. 9—11.) The passage seems immediately to predict the establishment of the divine Redeemer's kingdom on earth, the destruction of all implacable enemies to him, from among men, and the most universal subjection to the gospel, through all nations. (Notes, xli. 10—14. 1 Cor. xv. 20—28.) But St. Paul also applies it to the future judgment; (Note, Rom. xiv. 7—12;) when every man must give an account of himself to God, by appearing before the tribunal of Christ. Then all will know his right to be their King and Judge; his enemies will be put to shame, and perish; his people shall be declared righteous, and shall glory in him as their God and Saviour for ever.—Bishop Lowth translates the words, rendered in our version "a just God and a Saviour" (21), "A God that uttereth truth, and granteth salvation." Yet he assigns no reason for deviating so materially from the literal, general, and almost universally received meaning of the words, "A just God and a Saviour." A God infinite in justice, and infinite in mercy, is the God who has revealed himself to man in the scriptures, as "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" and by this especially he is distinguished, not only from the idols of the heathen, but also from the imaginary supreme being of infidel philosophers of every description. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 1—7, v. 3.) It may be questioned whether the word (צֶדֶק) ever signifies simply uttering truth; though it sometimes means faithful, or performing engagements, which were originally entered into of free grace: for the fulfilling of an engagement is an act of justice, whatever induced the person to make it: (Note, 1 John i. 8—10 :) and justice seems ultimately in all cases the meaning of the original word. Again, he renders a word from the same root, Salvation, which our version translates most properly, "righteousness" (24), and thus the strong testimony of this chapter to the leading doctrine of the believer's being "made the righteousness of God in Christ," is wholly kept out of sight!—"Here God confirms by an oath the truth of what was foretold in the twenty-second verse; that the time should certainly come, when all the world should give glory to him, by paying him solemn worship, ... and by swearing or professing allegiance to him. ... What the prophet speaks here in the person of God, is applied by St. Paul to Christ, that is, to the second person of the blessed Trinity. Comp. vi. 1. with John xii. 41.—viii. 14. with Rom. ix. 33. ... Many more such instances might be given; and all of them are plain proofs of the divinity of Christ; and that the prophets of the Old Testament had all along an eye to the times of the New, and spoke of the Messiah as God. ... This likewise (24), is very applicable to Christ, who is called "The LORD our Righteousness," ... and is "made unto us Righteousness." ... To be justified is a term taken from the forms of law, and signifies to be acquitted, or pronounced innocent, and to come off victorious in a cause.' Lowth.—It seems indeed, in the scripture to mean even more than this; namely, to be accounted and dealt with, not only as innocent, which merely exempts from punishment; but as righteous, and entitled to the reward of righteousness.—Adam was innocent, on the day of his creation: but he never attained to righteousness; that is, in himself: because he did not fulfil the commands of God, during the probation allotted him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The Lord disposes, as it pleases him, in his wise and righteous sovereignty, of the authority, wealth, and honours of the world; he gives every man that capacity and success which he sees good; and he assigns to each his part in the execution of his immense, his universal plan. He frequently employs such as know him not, to accomplish those ends, which require extensive dominion, and are attended with great bloodshed: for he knows, that obscure situations are more advantageous to the souls, and peaceful employments more agreeable to the minds, of his true people. (Note, Jam. ii. 5—7.)—The Lord does all things for the sake of “his elect,” and to promote their comfort and salvation: and we should improve our talents for the same purpose. (Notes, 2 Cor. iv. 7. 13—18. 2 Tim. ii. 8—13, v. 10. Tit. i. 1—4.)—It is the express design of the prophecies, which are fulfilling from age to age, by those who know not God, to attract the attention of men, “from the rising to the setting of the sun,” to enquire after the LORD, by whose inspiration the Bible was written: we should therefore study the prophecies, mark their accomplishments, and point them out to others for the same important ends. (Notes, Rev. i. 3. xxii. 6, 7.) Whether peace and prosperity, or evil and adversity be allotted us; we should recollect, that the Lord creates all these things, that all creatures are his instruments, and that nothing can exceed the limits which he assigns it. From God “the Father of lights cometh every good and perfect gift:” and even the evil, that he permits, is over-ruled for greater good to all his faithful servants, and to the more complete discovery of the glory of his name. But, whilst we submit to his will in those troubles, which come upon us through the wickedness of men; and give him the glory of all the good that is wrought in us or done by us: let us take all the blame of our sins to ourselves; for “God cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man.” Let us turn his promises into prayers, and beseech him, that “the heavens may pour down righteousness” and grace upon the earth, rendering it exceedingly fruitful; and that salvation, with all its sanctifying effects, “may spring forth and abound in every land;” that our “God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ.”

V. 9—14.

We ought carefully to watch over ourselves, and repress any risings of our hearts against the decrees, dispensations, great expence, not to be compared with God, who declares his purposes before he executeth them, especially the deliverance of the Jews by Cyrus, 5—11. The stout hearted far from righteousness, but salvation near to Israel, 12, 13.

and precepts of the Lord.—It is madness in the extreme for us frail creatures to contend with the Almighty, while we see such numbers perish by their contests with feeble mortals like themselves. JEHOVAH disdains and abhors our impotent arrogance and perverseness, when we dare to object to his sovereign appointments. It is our wisdom to reverence the depths which we cannot fathom, and to silence our presumption by considering our own ignorance and weakness, and his infinite perfections; and by taking it for granted, that “the Judge of all the earth will do right.” (Notes, Gen. xviii. 23—26. Rom. xi. 33—36.) We may enquire of the Holy One of Israel, concerning the things, which he freely gives to his children, and of what he requires of his creatures; and we may ask what we will of him in humble prayer, and he will do it for us, if it be for our good. But it is intolerable insolence in any man, to demand an account of the Lord’s dealings, as if he had authority to interfere, and give orders to him how he ought to dispose of his own works. Yet nothing is more common than objections and decisions, which imply this horrid blasphemy! But let us endeavour to get acquainted with our own character and place; and to wait the performance of the Lord’s promises, in the way of his precepts: and in due time he will answer all objections, and clear up all difficulties.—Our offended Creator, when he might have left us captives to sin and Satan, to whom we were sold for our crimes, has raised up a mighty Redeemer for us, even his own Son; who, having satisfied the divine justice with the sacrifice of himself, sets the souls of believers at liberty, “without price or reward,” and makes them citizens of that holy city, which he has builded for his own eternal residence. As this greatest of all promises has already been accomplished, we may be assured that all the rest shall in due season. (Notes, Ps. cxxxviii. 2. Rom. v. 6—10. viii. 32—34.) He will bring all the potent and mighty nations of the earth to join themselves to his despised people, and make them heirs in Christ Jesus; and they shall all know, that God honours and dwells in his church, and that none else can bless them. Many have thus yielded themselves to Christ and to his people, and have supplicated admission to their communion and privileges; others will continue to come in to them, till his cause has gained the entire ascendancy: and all who truly join themselves to the Lord and his people, are constrained by love, to devote their labour and substance to promote his honour and cause, and to count “his service perfect freedom.”

V. 15—25.

Our God and Saviour often hides his tender compassions behind frowning dispensations; and requires us to walk by faith, and to give him credit for his wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy, when we cannot see them; for “what he doeth we know not now, but we shall know hereafter.” (Note, John xiii. 6—11, v. 7.) If then he hides his face from us, let us humbly wait for him: for, while the most prosperous sinners, and self-confident hypocrites, will soon go into confusion together; they who trust in the Lord, and partake of his grace, shall be saved, in and by him, "with an everlasting salvation, and shall not be ashamed or confounded for ever." Neither his works nor his word are in vain: as he created the world to be inhabited; so he gave Israel his oracles that they should be proclaimed, and his promises that they should be believed. He would not have this light put in a secret or dark place, but diffused far and wide; and he never said to the seed of Jacob who wrestled, and prevailed, and was surnamed Israel, that they should seek his face in vain. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 24—28.) For the Lord speaks in truth and righteousness: and though to the proud, carnal heart, his words appear obscure; they are all plain to the humble soul, as well as sincere and faithful, and to be entirely depended on. Let sinners then renounce their iniquities and superstitions, and cease to pray to mediators or idols, that cannot save: (Notes, Ps. lxxviii. 19, 20. John iv. 21—24, v. 22 :) and let them with one consent draw near to him, who is "a just God and a Saviour," and who glorifies his righteousness in pardoning the most atrocious offenders, when they, penitently and in faith, rely on the merits of Jesus Christ and "come to God by him." (Note, Heb. vii. 23—25.) He, who once was lifted up on the cross, now calls from his glorious throne, and invites all the ends of the earth to look to him for salvation. He is "the true God and eternal life;" and besides him there is no other able to save from the wrath to come. In one way or another all must come before him, and submit unto him: for he has irrevocably confirmed it with an oath, that "every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, unto him." As we then must all appear before his judgment-seat; and all his enemies however fierce or powerful, yea, all that will not have him to reign over them, must be covered with shame and confusion: may we now come to him as "the LORD our Righteousness," and trust in him for acceptance, sanctification, and victory over every enemy: that we may be justified, and rejoice and glory, in Him, and in his salvation, and walk worthy of it; and at last be "presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy." (Note, Jude 22—25.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1, 2. Bel, (a contraction probably of Baal,) and Nebo, were the two principal idols of Babylon. When that city was taken by the Persians, the images of these imaginary deities were seized on by the victors, and broken down: and among the rest, no doubt, the golden image, set up by Nebuchadnezzar: (Note, Dan. iii. 1—7 :) for the Persians were generally Magians, who did not worship idols, but the sun under the symbol of fire. (Note, xlv. 7.) They would therefore load their beasts of burden, or their waggons, with the metals of which the images were formed; and carry them into captivity. 'The expressions '...allude to the custom of carrying idols in procession, which was a solemn piece of worship paid to them; whereas now they were carried about, by way of contempt and derision.' Lowth. When the Philistines took the ark of God, it became a burden to them, and they were induced to send it back, with trespass offerings, and memorials of their own disgrace: (Notes, 1 Sam. v. vi. 1—18. 2 Sam. v. 21 :) but the idols of Babylon would only prove a burden to the "weary beasts" which carried them away, as they could neither deliver themselves, nor those who had "the charge of them;" as the word rendered "burden" (2) seems to mean.—Their soul. (2) Marg. 'He derideth their idols, which had neither soul nor sense.' (Notes, xxi. 6—9. Jer. xliii. 8—13. 1. 2, 3. li. 47.)

V. 3, 4. The continued care, which the Lord had always shewn towards Israel, and all his powerful works in their behalf, are here contrasted with the impotency of the gods of Babylon. The latter had been carried off by the weary beasts: the former had always carried Israel, in the arms of his love and power, as the nurse carries and tends the new born infant. (Notes, Ex. xix. 4. Num. xi. 11—15. Deut. i. 29—31. xxxii. 11, 12.) JEHOVAH had done this from the time when they were called out of Egypt, which was as the birth of their church and nation, to their deliverance from Babylon, when he come, as it were, helpless through old age: and thus he would always do, whilst they continued to be his people. (Notes, Ps. lxxi. 5—9. 17, 18.) —Remnant, &c. (3) Israel, as distinguished from Judah, was reduced to a small remnant.—I am he. (4) 'I am the same' (God): 'so the phrase is translated. Ps. cii. 27.' Lowth.

V. 5—9. The Jews were always prone to make images representing God, as well as to worship the idols of other nations. But he here called their attention to the lavish and useless expense, to which the idolaters put themselves, in making a lifeless image, that was only a trouble and burden to them. It was rather a likeness of a dead corpse, than of the living God: when they had with much labour carried it, and fixed it in its place, they would be sure to find it there, except it should be thrown down or stolen: (Notes, Judg. xviii. 13—26. 1 Sam. v. 1—5;) for it could not move itself; and therefore it was not able to answer their prayers, or deliver them out of their trouble. (Notes, xl. 18—20. xli. 5—7. xlv. 9—20. Ps. cxv. 3—8. Jer. x. 1—11.) Let then the Jews remember these things, and shew themselves men, acting like reasonable creatures, and avoiding such an absurd abomination. Let those, who had thus apostatized, review their conduct and retract their error; considering the former works of God to his people, by which he shewed himself exclusively entitled to their adoration.—Some think, that the folly of idolaters is thus repeatedly exposed, to prevent the captive Jews in Babylon, from conforming to the idolatry of their conquerors; and indeed they seem to have kept far more free from that crime, when living among idolaters, than they had done in their own land.

V. 10, 11. From the beginning of the world God had declared what would come to pass to the end of time; (Note, Gen. iii. 14, 15;) and from ancient times he had predicted the things, which were not then accomplished. He had declared his determinations, and no power in the universe could defeat them; but “his counsel should stand, and he would do all his pleasure:” especially he would call Cyrus, like an eagle or bird of prey, from a far country, “the man of his counsel,” to execute his purposes of delivering the Jews. (Notes, xiv. 24—27. xlv. 6—8. 24—28. xlv. 1—8. Dan. iv. 34—37. Rom. viii. 29—31. Eph. i. 3—8. iii. 9—12.)—The standard of Cyrus was a golden eagle, and the rapidity of his conquests answered to the emblem.

V. 12, 13. Obstinate, presumptuous, and impenitent sinners, both of the Jews and Gentiles, were here addressed. Such were “far from the righteousness,” both from that of the law, and that of faith; yet they were summoned to hearken to the word of the Lord. He would speedily perform his righteous engagements to his people, execute his just vengeance on his enemies, and establish his righteousness in the earth. He would deliver the Jews from Babylon, again make Zion his peculiar residence, and there reveal his salvation: and there it should be stationed, for the benefit of Israel, in whom he gloried, and in and by whom he would be glorified.—Bishop Lowth translates the clause “far from righteousness,” “far from deliverance:” and again that rendered, “my righteousness,” “my promised deliverance:”—but this greatly obscures the meaning of the text; and it may be questioned, whether the word be ever used in that sense. It is a substantive from the same root (פָּדָה) with that adjective, which he renders speaking truth, in the clause, (as it stands in our version,) “A just God and a Saviour.” (Notes, xlv. 20—25. li. 4—8. lxi. 10, 11.)

Far from righteousness. (12) ‘Such as do not think it reasonable to acquiesce in my promises, which whosoever believeth, it shall be accounted to him for righteousness.’ Lowth.

Shall not tarry. (13) Shall not be postponed, or delayed; that is, beyond the appointed time. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 10. Dan. ix. 24—27. Hag. ii. 6—9.) This solemn declaration is a full refutation of the pretence of the Jews, that the coming of the Messiah is postponed, because of their sins.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The things, from which ungodly men expect safety and happiness, will soon be torn from them, and be totally incapable of saving them from death and hell: even at present they have much more trouble than comfort from them; and they commonly become an encumbrance and a snare to those, to whom they afterwards devolve. (Note, ii. 19—21.) But happy is the man, who trusts in God, and expects felicity from him! As his providence seems especially to watch over the helpless infant, and those who are decrepid through age; so his gracious care is peculiarly employed about the new-born babes of his family, and those who are grown hoary in his service. The history of the life of every individual, from the womb to the grave, is a kind of abstract of the history of Israel, through their successive generations: and, notwithstanding all our ingratitude and rebellions, we have each of us experienced numberless instances of JEHOVAH’s powerful protection, and tender care over us. If then we have learned to trust have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: ° thou didst shew them no mercy; ° upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.

7 And ° thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever; ° so that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart, neither didst remember the latter end of it.

8 Therefore hear now this, thou that art ° given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, ° I am, and none else beside me; ° I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children:

9 But ° these two things shall come to thee ° in a moment in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood: ° they shall come upon thee in their perfection, ° for the multitude of thy sorceries, and for the great abundance of thine enchantments.

10 For ° thou hast trusted in thy wickedness: ° thou hast said, None seeth me. ° Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath ° perverted thee; and thou hast said in thine heart, ° I am, and none else beside me.

11 Therefore shall evil come upon thee; ° thou shalt not know ° from whence it riseth: and mischief shall fall upon thee; ° thou shalt not be able to ° put it off: and desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know.

12 Stand ° now with thine enchantments, and with the multitude of thy sorceries, wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth, if so be thou shalt be able to profit; if so be thou mayest prevail.

13 Thou art ° wearied in the multitude of thy counsels. ° Let now the ° astrologers, the star-gazers, ° the monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee.

14 Behold ° they shall be as stubble; the fire shall burn them; they shall not deliver ° themselves from the power of the flame: ° there shall not be a coal to warm at, nor fire to sit before it.

15 Thus shall they be unto thee with whom thou hast laboured, even ° thy merchants from thy youth: ° they shall wander every one to his quarter; none shall save thee.

Chaldeans, intent on gratifying their own ambition, rapacity, and indignant revenge, and perhaps enmity to the God of Israel, most cruelly entreated the Jews, when they got them into their power; not knowing or regarding the design of God, in thus giving his worshippers into their hands: so that, while they accomplished his righteous purposes without intending it, they brought down deserved judgments on themselves. (Notes, x. 5—14. Jer. xxv. 12. li. 33—37. Hos. i. 4, 5. Zech. i. 14—17.)

V. 7—10. Notwithstanding these predictions against Babylon, the king and his nobles were confident that their dominion and prosperity were firmly and permanently established; they neither laid their own crimes, and the words of God, to heart, nor considered what the end of their greatness would be. (Notes, Dan. iv. 28—33. v. 18—24. 1 Thes. v. 1—3.) The inhabitants were given up to pleasures and dissipation; and arrogantly concluded that no city or empire ever had been, was, or would be, like their own; and they expressed this sentiment, in language similar to that, by which JEHOVAH declared his own eternal Deity. (xlv. 5, 6.)—The loss of empire, and the destruction of the inhabitants, are, to cities possessed of dominion, like widowhood and loss of children. Babylon thought herself perfectly secure from these afflictions: but the Lord declared, that they would come upon her in one day, in a moment, most suddenly, and in their perfection, “for,” or notwithstanding “the multitude of her sorceries” and enchantments. The Chaldeans trusted much to these practices, and disregarded the all-seeing eye of Israel’s God; but the permanent prosperity, with which she was flattered by the sorcerers and wise men, would not be vouchsafed her. (Notes, 11—15. xix. 2—4. Nah. iii. 4—6. Rev. xviii. 4—8.)

V. 11. Neither the politicians, nor the soothsayers, of Babylon could discover, from what quarter evil would come upon them; nor when it approached could they retard it: nay, at last it would come on them suddenly, when they had no apprehension of it.—Cyrus surprised the city, when the inhabitants were asleep, or in their drunken revels, and entirely without fear of the impending ruin. (Notes, Dan. v. 25—31.)

To put it off.] “To expiate it.” Marg. The desolation, which is denounced, as coming upon the New Testament Babylon, still more suddenly and awfully, shall not be expiated, by any of the superstitious devices, or sacrifices of its priests and rulers. (Note, 1 Sam. iii. 14.)

V. 12—15. (Note, lvii. 9, 10.) The Lord here challenged the Chaldeans, to oppose their wisest counsels, or most powerful enchantments, against the execution of his predictions: let them persist in them, and do their utmost, and see whether they could prevail in the contest. Babylon had always been renowned for these arts, and the Chaldeans diligently studied and practised them. Even their wise men and counsellors were chiefly diviners and astrologers. (Notes, Dan. i. 17—20. ii. 2—13. iv. 4—7. v. 5—9.) They expected, or pretended to expect, informa-

CHAP. XLVIII.

The Lord, foreseeing the obstinate idolatry of Israel had foretold what he was about to do, that his works might not be ascribed to idols, 1—8. He promises to save his people, for his own name's sake, by his almighty power, and by raising up and prospering Cyrus, 9—15. He pathetically shews, how happy obedience would have rendered them, 16—19. He calls on the captive Jews to leave Babylon, remembering how their fathers had been supplied in the wilderness; and declares that there is no peace for the wicked, 20—22

tion, and direction, from the motions of the heavenly bodies; and supposed the stars to have great influence on the affairs of men, which they could discover by making observations on them: and they seem to have published every month their prognostications, as some almanack-makers now do their yearly predictions, about the weather and other matters. But the Lord declared, that they should all weary themselves in vain, in their counsels to secure Babylon; nay, themselves should be as stubble to the fire of his indignation, by which they should be totally consumed without any remains. And in this catastrophe, all those, who had before dealt with them for such information; or the merchants and hired soldiers from other countries, who had traded with them and helped them would desert them, go to their respective habitations or employments, and leave them to shift for themselves. All these predictions, concerning Babylon, relate also to the New Testament Babylon, the chief seat of Antichrist. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. li. 9. Rev. xviii. 9—20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord invariably abases the proud, in proportion as they exalt themselves.—Those who are most delicate and luxurious, and given up to self-indulgence and dissipation, are commonly most unfeeling, towards such as are subjected to them; often shewing no respect to old age or infirmities, and deeming no hardship too great to impose on those who are least able to endure them. But they may probably be recompensed by others, as severe and hard-hearted as themselves: while labour and fatiguing usage, with scorn and cruelty, will be dreadful to them, in proportion to their former excessive effeminacy. (Notes, iii. 16—26.)—Those distinctions in society, by which some are exalted above others, as if of another species, will be of short continuance: kings and nobles will not be such for ever; nor will God any more regard sex than rank, in those who rebel against him. But they, who are made “kings and priests unto our God,” shall be distinguished for ever: for “their Redeemer is the LORD of hosts, the Holy One of Israel;” and when the most honourable of the wicked shall be silent in darkness, or only vent their anguish in “wailing and gnashing of teeth,” the believer’s redemption will be completed.—God is often pleased to permit wicked men to prevail against his people, in order to correct and purify them by tribulation: and he permits his inheritance, his professed servants, to be polluted and treated as heathens: in order to purge his church from hypocrites, and to warn others not to abuse their privileges.

HEAR ye this, O house of Jacob, ^a which are called by the name of Israel, and are ^b come forth out of the waters of Judah; ^c which swear by the name of the LORD, and ^d make mention of the God of Israel, but ^e not in truth, nor in righteousness.

(Notes and P. O. 1 Sam. iv.) But those who take advantage of these dispensations, to abuse their power, and to shew their enmity against God, by cruelly oppressing his worshippers, will be punished with proportionable severity.—Pride renders men presumptuous in their wickedness and regardless of their latter end; so that they “lay not to heart,” either the warnings or the judgments of God; they expect impunity, notwithstanding his “wrath revealed from heaven” against their iniquities; and they are confident of permanent prosperity, until ruin comes upon them suddenly and in its perfection, and they can neither see whence it arises, nor how it may be avoided. Such as do not trust in God, buoy up their confidence by means of wickedness in one form or other, and they are ready to think, that no eye sees those secret crimes which man cannot detect. And whilst men will not believe the authenticated truths of God, because they contradict their pride and lusts; they often become the dupes of their own credulity, and of the vilest impostors; even of the meanest of such as pretend to gratify their curiosity by informing them of future events, and humour them with promises of great prosperity, without disquieting their consciences, or requiring them to renounce their sins. Hence the encouragement which sorcery, divination, astrology, and fortune-telling of every kind, have ever met with, in proportion as the holy truths and precepts of scripture have been disregarded. But the Lord scorns, and abhors, such daring attempts to pry into his secret purposes, or to escape his threatened vengeance. However men may labour and weary themselves in these vain endeavours, they will never be able to prevail for others or themselves; they will shortly be destroyed root and branch, by the consuming fire of the Lord’s indignation; and it will appear, that they could neither foresee nor prevent the ruin to which they were exposed. But, if we simply and firmly believe the word of God, we may know assuredly how it will be with the righteous and the wicked to all eternity; we may learn how to “escape the wrath to come,” to glorify God, to have peace through life, and hope in death, and everlasting happiness beyond the grave: and surely we need desire no further information in these matters. Let us then stand aloof from all the delusions of men, and of the great deceiver; and learn to walk by faith, through the troubles of life and the vale of death, to the land of perfect light, joy, and felicity.

descent from Jacob, and in the name of Israel, which God had in honour conferred on him; (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 27, 28. John i. 47—51;) they boasted also of springing from Judah, to whom the sceptre belonged, and from whom the Messiah was to descend. They were likewise accustomed to use the name of JEHOVAH in solemn oaths, and to make mention of him as their God. (Notes, xlv. 23—25. Jer. v. 1, 2.) They prided themselves also upon their relation to that holy city, where his temple was built and his worship conducted: and on these accounts they were very confident, that God would render them successful, and deliver them from all their enemies. Yet there was neither sincerity in their religion, nor holiness in their lives; they were deceitful and dishonest in their dealings; and they concealed their frauds by perjury and hypocrisy.—It appears from the prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Micah, that this was the general disposition of the people, just before the captivity. (Notes, Jer. vii. 3—11. xxvi. 9—19. Ez. xi. 1—3. Mic. iii. 8—12. Matt. iii. 7—10. Acts vi. 9—14).—Out of the waters, &c. (1) As water springs from a fountain. (Notes, Num. xxiv. 7—9. Ps. lxxviii. 26. Prov. v. 15—19.)

V. 3—5. In order to lead the people to be more earnest in adhering to his worship and commandments, the Lord again reminded them of the conclusive proof, which prophecy afforded them of their divine authority. Nothing material had occurred, since the original of their nation, which had not been predicted. God had previously informed them what he purposed to do; and then he had suddenly performed his word, when they had no expectation of it. He adopted this method, because he knew that they would prove obstinate and untractable, even as if the sinews of their necks had been made of iron; and bold and impudent in their objections and self-vindication, as if their brow were brass: (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Prov. xxix. 1. Ez. iii. 4—11. Acts vii. 51—53;) and, being alienated from true religion and attached to idolatry, they would absurdly and ungratefully have ascribed their delitime, even hidden things, and thou didst not know them.

7 They are created now, and not from the beginning; even before the day when thou heardest them not: lest thou shouldst say, Behold, I knew them.

8 Yea, ^t thou heardest not; yea, thou knewest not: yea, from that time that ^u thine ear was not opened; for ^x I knew that thou wouldst deal very treacherously, and wast called ^y a transgressor from the womb.

9 For ^z my name's sake will I ^a defer mine anger, and for my praise will I refrain for thee, that I cut thee not off.

10 Behold, ^b I have refined thee, but not ^c with silver: ^d I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction.

11 For ^e mine own sake, even for verances to their idols, had not JEHOVAH by his prophecies precluded them from such a pretence. (Notes, xlii. 22—25. xlv. 6—8. Jer. xlv. 15—19.)—‘The former things... may point at the former prophecies, relating to the two confederate kings, (vii.) and to Sennacherib; (x;) as the new things... relate to the Babylonian captivity, and their return from thence, as they were figures of the gospel-times. ... They punctually came to pass at the time foretold, even when there was no likelihood of such an effect being produced.’ Lowth.

V. 6—8. The Jews had already heard the prophecies concerning their nation; let them therefore mark, and see their exact accomplishment: and would they not at length declare this to be a demonstration, that JEHOVAH alone was entitled to their worship; and publish his wonderful works, according to his word, to other nations and succeeding ages? From the time, when former predictions had been accomplished, in their deliverance from the Syrians and Assyrians, the Lord shewed them “new things,” hidden from all creatures, of which no tokens appeared, and of which they knew nothing. (Notes, xlii. 8, 9. xliii. 14—21, v. 19.) His word, as in creation, gave them as it were their first existence: (Note, Gen. i. 3—5;) before he spake of them, the Jews had never heard of them, and therefore they could not ascribe the discovery either to their idols, or to their own sagacity. Yet, after all, the Lord foresaw that they would prove unbelieving and disobedient; and even shut their ears to instruction, however plainly set before them. For “their ear had not been opened from the beginning:” they had always been unteachable and self-willed: (Notes, l. 5, 6. Ps. xl. 6—8;) and they would continue to deserve the name of transgressor, apostate, or rebel, which he had given them in the very infancy of their nation, when they first came out of Egypt. (Notes, Ex. xxxii. 7—10. Ez. xx. 7—9.)

V. 9—11. The Lord saw nothing in the Jewish nation, to induce him to deliver it from captivity or to extend blessings to it: but the honour of his own great name was concerned. If idolaters should finally prevail against his worshippers, their gods would seem to triumph over the God of Israel : it behoved him to perform his engagements to Abraham, to Israel, and to David, and to maintain his worship in the world. “ For his own sake,” therefore, he would defer his anger, and not cast off the Jews till after the coming of the Messiah : for his own glory, he would refrain from pouring out his indignation, and utterly destroying them. (Notes, xliii. 22—25. Deut. xxxii. 26, 27. Ps. lxxix. 8—13. Jer. xiv. 7—9. 19—22. Ez. xx. 7—9, v. 9. Dan. ix. 17—19. Eph. i. 3—12.) By various calamities he shall refine them, as metal in a furnace : and though they were not fully purified as refined silver, but still had a great mixture of base metal among them ; yet he would again choose them amidst the afflictions of Babylon, as he had their fathers in the iron furnace of Egypt. (Marg. Ref.) This he would do, not for their sakes, but that his name might not be profaned, or his glory given to idols.—‘ I had respect to thy weakness and infirmity : for ‘ in silver there is some pureness, but in us there is nothing ‘ but dross.’—If the furnace of affliction had not been moderated, they must have been consumed. (Notes, Ps. cxxv. 3. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22.)—‘ God joineth the salvation ‘ of his, with his own honour ; so that they cannot perish, ‘ but his glory should be diminished.’ (Notes, Ex. xxxii. 11—14. Num. xiv. 13—19. Josh. vii. 6—9. Ez. xxxvi. 20—24. 31, 32.)

V. 12—15. The eternal and unchangeable God of Israel here calls upon his people to hearken to him. (Note, xli. 2—4.) The same almighty power which had founded the earth, “ meted out the heavens with a span,” and issued orders to their hosts which were implicitly obeyed, was pledged to perform the predictions concerning the deliverance of the Jews from captivity. (Notes, xl. 12—17. 25, 26.) Let then all of them assemble, consider, and ask themselves, whether JEHOVAH, or some of their idols, had foretold these things ; that they might ascribe the accomplishment unto him. (Notes, xli. 21—26. xliii. 8—13.) He meant to shew especial favour to Cyrus, (as a type of Christ,) in assigning him the honourable work of liberating his people. So that this prince would execute the Lord’s pleasure, and be as his arm, in taking Babylon, and subduing the Chaldean monarchy : for God would call him to this arduous undertaking, and prosper him in it. (Notes, xli. 27—29. xlv. 25—28. xlv. 1—6. xlv. 10, 11.)—The expression, “ my called ” (12), may refer to the call of Abraham, (Note, Gen. xii. 1—3,) and the nation of Israel in him, which was a type or emblem of the effectual calling of the elect people of God : (Notes, xli. 2—4. 10—14 :) but some explain it of the Israelites being called by the name of God, as a people peculiarly belonging to him.

V. 16. There is some appearance of difficulty in ascertaining the speaker in this verse : but if the prophet be supposed to speak, it must be as a type of the “ Elect “ Servant of JEHOVAH,” before predicted. (Note, xlii. 1—4.) From the opening of his ministry, Isaiah had publicly spoken of those things which were coming to pass, and events had accorded to his predictions ; he had from the first been at hand to declare the will of the Lord : and now the Lord God and his Spirit had sent him to predict the captivity, and also the deliverance of the Jews from it ; and it behoved them to come near and attend to his words.—This however, seems not by any means to come up to the energy and full meaning of the passage : and, “ The “ Word, who was in the beginning with God, and was “ God,” and by whom the mind and will of God have ever been declared to men, may properly be considered as the Speaker. He had always addressed the nation in the most open manner, from the time when he appeared to Moses in the bush, and called himself, I AM THAT I AM : (Notes, Ex. iii. 2—7. 14. Acts vii. 30—36 :) and He was constantly present with Israel as their Lord and Redeemer. And now the Father and his Spirit had sent him to effect their predicted deliverance : or the Lord God had sent Him and his Spirit ; for so the words may be read, and the language accords better to the ordinary style of scripture. The deliverance from Babylon seems to be predicted ; yet as shadowing forth the incarnation of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit, to apply his redemption to the souls of men.—‘ The foregoing part of the verse shews, ‘ that the words are spoken by God : and since it is affirmed, that the Lord God hath sent him, we can understand the words of none other, but the second Person ‘ of the sacred Trinity ; who was sent into the world by ‘ his Father, and was anointed to his prophetic office by ‘ the Holy Spirit.’ Lowth. (Notes, Zech. ii. 6—13. iv. 8—10. vi. 9—15. John vi. 7—14.)—‘ Who is it that saith in ‘ Isaiah, “ And now the Lord hath sent me and his Spirit ? ” ‘ in which, as the expression is ambiguous, is it the ‘ Father and the Holy Spirit, which have sent Jesus ; or

'the Father who hath sent both Christ and the Holy Spirit? The latter is the true interpretation.' Origen in Bp. Lowth.

V. 17—19. JEHOVAH, the Redeemer and Holy One of Israel, continues to speak to his people, when in captivity. He had taught them profitable things, and had pointed out to them the way in which they should have gone; and he was ever ready to afford his effectual teaching to such, as desired to profit by his word. This would have been far more agreeable to his holy will as revealed by his servants, than their rebellion and calamities; so that, speaking after the manner of men, he, as it were, wished that they would have hearkened to his commandments: for then their peace would have flowed with an even, uninterrupted course, like a river, the waters of which fail not: and he would have shewn them how to obtain righteousness and salvation, vast as the ocean, and a permanent and inexhaustible source of blessings to their souls: their seed would then have been innumerable as the sand, and "gravel," or, as some understand it, the fishes, of the sea; and their name would never have been cut off, or cast out. Whereas, for their sins they were reduced to a remnant, and to great distress and contempt. (Notes, Deut. v. 28, 29. xxxii. 29. Ps. lxxxii. 13—16. Luke xix. 41—44.)—Righteousness. (18) Notes, xlv. 22—25. xlv. 12, 13.

V. 20—22. The Lord here addressed the people, as if the time of the decree of Cyrus had been already come. They were summoned to go forth from Babylon, and flee from among its devoted inhabitants, singing praises to the Lord, and publishing his truth, power, and love, to the ends of the earth. (Notes, li. 9—11. lii. 9—12. Jer. i. 7, 8. Zech. ii. 6—9. Rev. xviii. 4—8.) When the Israelites passed through the wilderness from Egypt to Canaan, the waters gushed from the smitten rock to satisfy their thirst: and the Lord intimated that he would equally take care of the Jews in returning from Babylon to Jerusalem. (Notes, xxxv. 5—7. xli. 17—20. xliii. 19—21. Ex. xvii. 5, 6. Jer. xxxi. 8, 9.) But, as the language is too strong to have received a full accomplishment in any of the events, attending that deliverance; we may be assured that the Holy Ghost intended the spiritual blessings of redemption; and the wonderful interpositions, with which the rescue of the church from Antichristian tyranny shall be accompanied, and especially the converted Jews and Israelites conveyed back to the promised land.—Whatever revolutions take place, the Lord also warned impenitent sinners, that no good would accrue to them; (Notes, iii. 11, 12. lvii. 20, 21. Ez. xx. 33—38;) for all that inward anguish and outward tribulation, which spring from guilt and from the wrath of God, must inevitably be their portion, throughout every period of their endless existence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Men may have a sound creed, make an open profession of true religion, and with apparent devotion "mention the name" of God, value themselves on their relation to his people, and join with them in the most solemn ordinances; and yet be hypocrites in religion, and destitute of common honesty in their dealings with their neighbours? Nay, men may have strong confidence in the Lord, and verily think that all the blessings of salvation belong to them; when they are entirely deceived by Satan and their own hearts, and have no more than a worthless "form of godliness!" (Notes, Prov. xiv. 12. Gal. vi. 1—5, v. 3.) Let us then be careful not to over-value external distinctions, privileges, or observances; and not to stay our souls on any relation to families, or churches, eminent for piety. Let us examine whether we be indeed sincere, in our own professed faith and devotedness to God; and whether these produce truth and equity in all our dealings with men. Let us remember that confidence without conscientiousness is presumption; and that those who cheat their neighbours, and varnish it over with a profession of godliness, will "receive the greater damnation." May the Lord search and prove us, and render us "doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving our own selves!" (Note, Jam. i. 22—25.)—The divine origin of our religion is abundantly demonstrated, in the co-incidence observable between the prophecies of the Bible, and the dispensations of Providence; so that infidelity, impiety, and hypocrisy, will be left without plea or excuse: and this arrangement is purposely intended to leave every one without cloke for his sins. For the Lord knows how obstinate and daring men are, in rebellion against his authority, and opposition to his truths. Indeed we are all by nature self-willed and presumptuous: we are ready to ascribe success to our own sagacity or good management, or even to that conduct which God abhors: and when calamities overtake us, we deem them the result of chance, or lay the blame on the ill behaviour of others. Thus we studiously forget God, and aim to exclude him from the government of the world. But the whole scheme of prophecy is a standing confutation of these absurd principles, and this preposterous conduct: as things hidden from every created mind, and which must appear at the time improbable in the highest degree, have for ages been foretold in the sacred scriptures, and are continually coming to pass accordingly. Yet how little is this attended to! how little are men disposed to receive instruction, and yield obedience to God! But hence arises another demonstration of the truth of the scripture, which every man possesses in his own conscience. Contrary to our self-flattery, the scripture declares, that "every man dealeth very treacherously, and is a transgressor from the womb." And is not this witness true? have not we each of us, violated our obligations to God? and were not our first thoughts, words, and works rebellious and unholy?—We have then nothing in ourselves to depend on, or to plead with God, as a reason why he should have mercy on us. Had he not deferred and refrained his anger, we should have been cut off and destroyed long ago. But he has formed a plan, in which, for "his own sake" and "for the glory of his grace," he saves all that come to him for salvation. Thus sinners are encouraged to hope for his mercy. And he that "hath fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before him," and "holds fast that confidence," has the honour of God pledged for his security, that he shall never be cast off, or perish; for then would God's name be polluted, and his glory tarnished. He will indeed refine his people in the furnace of affliction: but, notwithstanding the alloy which remains after each visitation, he will yet confirm his choice of them; and frequently he first brings sinners acquainted with his grace, by casting them into this painful but salutary furnace.

The same power, which upholds the world, supports the cause of truth and righteousness; and it is a peculiar honour to be employed as instruments in the good work of making known the salvation of God to mankind. Yet even this, (as well as many other instances of the loving-kindness of God,) has been sometimes vouchsafed to those, who knew him not, by true faith and holy experience, to the salvation of their own souls. But the Lord Jesus alone has, in every respect, done the Father's whole pleasure," and is the adequate Object of his love: having prospered and finished his work, he invites sinners to draw near and hearken, whilst he proclaims the counsels of his love, which have been from the beginning. As the Father has sent him, so has he sent his ministers, to publish openly his rich and free salvation. May he send forth more and more of them throughout the earth; and with them send forth his Spirit to prosper their labours; that 'glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,' throughout the earth, and through eternal ages.—Let us seek to our holy Redeemer to "teach us to profit," by all the means of instruction which we enjoy, and to "lead us by the way that we should go;" for blessed are they who hear his word and do it. Our sanctification and comfort are his will and delight; inward and outward peace are his legacy to his believing people; and those, whom he justifies and sanctifies, have peace with God, peace of conscience, and an inward tranquillity "which passeth all understanding:" a peace, not transient and precarious, as the joys of this world are; but which flows on like a river through life and death, and to all eternity. The inheritance annexed to the righteousness which God bestows is immense as the ocean, its blessings unnumbered like the sand, and it is attended with "an everlasting name that shall not be cut off;" and with an entail of most important advantages to our posterity. Let then all who hear these words separate from the world, and break loose from their ruinous connexions; let them join themselves to the Lord with gratitude and joy: and let believers sing glad praises to the Redeemer, and declare to all around "what he hath done for their souls."—Though this world is a wilderness, in which many inconveniences await us, and nothing grows or springs forth, suited to the wants and desires of the regenerated; yet from Christ, our smitten Rock, the consolations of the Holy Spirit flow forth abundantly to water all the camp of Israel, through all their wanderings; till each arrives at the Fountain-head above, and drinks abundantly of unalloyed felicity for ever. But this peace and joy are far from the wicked man: by an irrevocable decree, and by his character and the state of his unrenewed soul, he will be for ever precluded from them; and a tormenting conscience, a despairing heart, and furious, unrestrained, and malignant passions, will concur with the wrath of God, to render him as durably miserable, as the righteous is blessed in the favour, image, and presence of his God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIX. V. 1, 2. Hitherto spiritual redemption has been predicted more obscurely, and with evident, and almost constant reference to the deliverance of the Jews from captivity in Babylon: but here another division of the prophecy commences; and henceforth we shall have Christ and spiritual redemption constantly before our eyes, and often entirely lose sight of types and shadows. (Notes, xlii. 5—7. Luke ii. 25—32, vv. 30—32. John i. 6—9. viii. 12. Acts xlii. 42—48, v. 47. xxvi. 16—18. 19—23, v. 23.)

V. 7, 8. The Father is " the LORD, the Redeemer of " Israel and his Holy One," as sending the Son to be the Redeemer: he created the worlds, and he redeemeth the church, by the Son, and without him was not any thing created or redeemed. (Notes, John i. 1—3. Tit. iii. 4—7.) The Father here addresses the incarnate Son, as he, " whom " man despised, and whom the nation of Israel abhorred;" and whom their rulers, as well as Pontius Pilate and Herod, treated as a slave. This decisively marked out the person intended, when he appeared on earth; as every one must perceive, who compares these expressions with the history of our Lord's condemnation, and crucifixion by the general demand of the Jewish nation and their rulers, and with every circumstance of scorn and abhorrence. (Notes, l. 5, 6. liii. 2, 3. Zech. xi. 7—9. Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 19—25. 37—44. Luke xxiii. 6—12.) This humiliation was, so to speak, the stipulated price of that glory which was to follow. For certainly kings would behold his glory, and rise up to acknowledge his supreme authority: they would fall down before him, submitting to him as their King, yea, worshipping him as their God! (Notes, 22, 23. lx. 1—3, v. 3. 10—14. 15—22, v. 16. Ps. lxxii. 8—11. cxxxviii. 4, 5. Rev. xxi. 22—27.) The faithfulness of JEHOVAH was engaged to accomplish this promise; and the Holy One of Israel, being " well pleased in him," as his beloved Son and righteous Servant, would choose him to be his " King upon his holy hill of Zion." (Notes, Ps. ii. 7—12.)—When the Roman Emperors embraced Christianity, this part of the prophecy began to be accomplished: it has been verified in many instances already, and will be far more signally hereafter.—When he undertook our cause, his requests were presented " in an acceptable time, " and in a day of salvation," and the Father readily acceded to them. The prayers that he offered " with strong crying " and tears," in the days of his flesh, were also accepted, and answered by his resurrection and exaltation; and his intercession is always presented in an acceptable time, and every thing is granted which he intercedes for. (Notes, Acts iv. 7—12, v. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. v. 7—10, v. 7. vii. 23—25, v. 25.)—Being thus preserved, and raised to the mediatorial throne; he was given as the Surety of the new covenant to sinners all over the earth, to establish it in the knowledge of God and true religion: and to cause all believers to inherit that heritage, from which as sinners they had been expelled, and which lay desolate; as the land of Judah did during the captivity, until the restoration of the Jews established the land, and caused them to inherit their desolated heritages. (Marg. Ref.—Note, li. 15, 16. P. O. Ps. lxxv. Note, cii. 13—22.)

V. 9—13. The conversion of the nations is here promised, under images taken from the deliverance of the captive Jews, and their return to Jerusalem. At the word of Christ, the prisoners of Satan, who were confined in the dark dungeons of ignorance, idolatry, and vice, would be set at liberty, come forth, and shew themselves among his redeemed subjects. (Notes, lxi. 1—3. Zech. ix. 11, 12. Luke iv. 16—19. Acts xxvi. 16—18.) Through his ordinances he comfortably feeds the souls of these his sheep, all their journey through life: (Notes, Ps. xxiii:) no place is found so mountainous, as not to yield pasturage for them; or their pastures are situated on high places, inaccessible to their enemies. They are not incommoded by hunger or thirst; or left to endure persecution, temptation, or affliction, without shelter, support, and consolation; for their merciful Redeemer conducts them, where the waters of life abound for their refreshment and consolation. (Notes, xii. 1—3. xxv. 3—5. xxxv. 8—10. xli. 17—20. xliii. 14—21. Jer. xxxi. 8, 9. Rev. vii. 13—17.) Even the loftiest mountains are made a highway: and a causeway or pavement, is prepared over the low places, that nothing may discourage or obstruct them in their journey.—The Lord then speaks, as if companies of converts, flocking into the church, appeared in sight; and points them out to the spectators, some of them coming from the north, others from the west, and others from the land of Sinim; by which some province in Egypt, or some district in Arabia, seems to be meant. All this denotes the clear instructions, unencumbered invitations, encouraging promises, and abundant outpouring of the Spirit, which would combine in rendering the gospel successful, especially in the primitive ages; as they will again, when “the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in.” In the prospect of events so merciful and comfortable to God’s afflicted people, the heavens, and the earth, and their respective inhabitants are called upon to break forth into songs of joy and praise. (Notes, xlv. 23. lv. 12, 13.)—‘The Hebrew word mesillah,’ (translated highways,) ‘signifies such ways as are raised with stone in low and marshy grounds. So the sense is exactly parallel with that of xl. 4: “Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain shall be brought low.” Lowth.—That, however, relates to the change wrought in men’s dispositions, preparing them to welcome the salvation of Christ; this, to the preparations made in the gospel, for believers passing safely and comfortably through this evil world to heaven.—Mr. Faber, interpreting the whole of the future restoration of Israel, understands the words, “Say to them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves,” or, “Be discovered,” of the ten tribes, which have been lost hitherto. (xxvii. 13.) But the close connexion of the passage, with Christ being “the Light of the Gentiles,” seems to render this exclusive application inadmissible.

V. 14—16. (Notes, Lam. v. 19—22. Hos. xi. 8—11, vv. 8, 9.) The Jewish church during the captivity, or the Christian church as groaning under antichristian superstition and tyranny, is here introduced, as ready to faint and despond; apprehending from appearances, that JEHOVAH, her Lord and King, had “forsaken” her, and even “forgotten” her and her concerns: that is, the remnant of believers in such circumstances would be tempted to think, that God would suffer his enemies to prevail against his cause. But he enquires of Zion, whether a tender mother can forget the infant, for which she hath endured much pain and sorrow, and which she is accustomed to nourish at her breast; and so forget it, as without compassion to leave it to perish by hunger and neglect. But though this is the strongest of all natural affections; yet some mothers do neglect their offspring to indulge themselves, and suffer them to perish for want of proper attention; nay, some murder them to conceal their own shame! It was therefore requisite, in order, that Zion might “have a strong consolation,” to add, that the love of God to his church admits of no such exception: the affection of a most tender mother forms but a faint emblem of his unchangeable love to his people, and he will never forget them. (Notes, Rom. viii. 32—39. Heb. vi. 16—20.) In allusion to customs then in use, of artificially marking upon the hands, such objects as those concerned wished continually to remember, he declares that he had “graven Zion on the palms of his hands, and that her walls were continually before him.” As the architect is continually mindful of the plan of his intended building, even whilst the rubbish is removing, in order to lay the foundation: so the Lord has the whole plan of his church, in its most flourishing state on earth and in heaven, always before him, during all the corruptions and tribulations which she passes through; and he will in the appointed periods, fulfil all his purposes, predictions, and promises to that effect. (Notes, Dan. ix. 24—27. Rev. xxi. 10—21.)—Zion. (14) Note, Rev. xiv. 1—5.

V. 17. Thy children, &c.] Or, “thy builders,” as in the old translation, with a trivial change in the punctuation. Those who were appointed to build the city and walls of Zion, would speedily begin and accomplish their work; and they, who had destroyed and wasted her, would speedily depart from her. Thus Cyrus hastened to take Babylon: and, having accomplished that design, when he succeeded to the kingdom, he hastened to give orders for rebuilding Jerusalem and the temple: the dominion of the Chaldeans, the destroyers of Zion, was at once terminated, and they departed, as unable to retard her returning prosperity. The speed and success, with which Nehemiah rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem, notwithstanding the opposition of the enemies, may also be adverted to.—But the deliverance of the church from antichristian oppressors; and the final and universal prevalence of true religion, are doubtless especially intended.—“They, that destroyed thee, shall soon become thy builders; and they, that laid thee waste, shall become thine offspring.” Bp. Lowth. This interpretation does not well accord either to the type or the Anti-type. The Chaldeans did not restore Jerusalem; but were conquered by Cyrus, who ordered it to be built: and antichristian powers are to be destroyed, in order to the future deliverance of the church. (Notes, 24—26. Rev. xviii. xix.)

an afflicted widow, bereaved also of her children. She is directed to look up, and behold great numbers approaching her from every quarter; and the Lord most solemnly assures her, that they come in order to be a comfort and honour to her: and that instead of the disconsolate attire and appearance, which had hitherto befitted her condition, this great accession to her family should render her adorned and cheerful as a bride. (Notes, lxi. 10, 11.) The desolate and waste places of the land also would soon be so replenished, that there would not be room for all the inhabitants; who would no more be annoyed or alarmed by those enemies, who had before swallowed them up. So that, after Zion's former desolations, her children should be so numerous, that they would earnestly demand more room.—The destruction of the Jews by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans, and the rejection of the nation for unbelief, were to that church as the loss of children: the state of the Jews during the captivity, and that of the Christian church during the reign of Antichrist; and especially that of the nation of Israel for almost eighteen hundred years, has resembled a desolate widow in captivity, wandering from place to place, without prospect of having or bringing up children: and the replenishing of the church after these desolations, might seem as the resurrection of her children from the dead, or their return to her after they had been supposed dead. It would be like the case of a poor forlorn widow, to whom many shew the respect and affection of children, for whom she has suffered no pain, and bestowed no labour: and she could not imagine whence these children came, or where they had been during her destitute and wandering condition.—After the captivity, the Jews were very much increased: they not only filled the land of Judah, but multitudes inhabited the adjacent cities and countries; and many were proselyted to their religion, and became Zion's adopted children. Yet, the context and the expressions lead us rather to interpret the prophecy of the enlargement of the church, by the breaking down of the partition-wall, and by the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ; which has already diffused the worship of the true God far more widely than of old; and which, after the recall of the Jews into the church, shall length fill the whole earth with the knowledge of his glory. (Notes, liv. 1—5. Jer. xxxi. 15—17.) The restoration of Israel, and the re-union of Judah and Israel, may be included in these general terms; but cannot be exclusively predicted.

V. 22, 23. JEHOVAH here further explains, how this increase of Zion's family would be effected. By the death of Christ and the preaching of the gospel, his hand was lifted up to summon the nations, and his standard erected for them to resort to. The numerous converts, made from among the Gentiles, are represented under the idea of many nations at once bringing Zion's sons and daughters home to her with the greatest care and tenderness; especially as they employed their ability to promote the cause of the gospel. (Note, lxvi. 19—23, vv. 19, 20.) Even kings would become foster-fathers, and queens nursing mothers to the children of Zion; (Note, Num. xi. 11—15, v. 12;) accounting it their honour and privilege, to use their influence and authority to promote the success of the gospel: rendering the most profound respect for the church and its faithful and consistent pastors and rulers; not attempting to have dominion over her faith, but promoting by all proper means her comfort and prosperity, and shewing her honour, for the Lord's sake, proportioned to the contempt and indignity with which she had been treated. (Note, lxvi. 10—14.) Then would it appear more than ever, that the immutable truth, power, and love of JEHOVAH were engaged in behalf of his people; and that those who wait for him shall never be put to shame.—'Cyrus, Artaxerxes, and other Persian monarchs, shewed signal favour to the Jews; and Esther... saved the nation from utter destruction: but the prophecy was more remarkably fulfilled, in the favours which Constantine... and other Christian princes and princesses have shewed to the church.' Lowth.—There can, however, be no dispute, but the grand accomplishment of these predictions is yet future. (Notes, lx. 10—14. Ps. lxxii. 9—11. Jer. xvi. 19—21. Mic. vii. 14—17. Rev. iii. 8, 9.)

With their face toward the earth. and princesses will improve their important talents, in a very reverential, humble, zealous, and diligent manner, to promote genuine Christianity by all scriptural means; counting this their privilege, honour, and pleasure, and specially honouring the consistent ministers of Christ, and Christ in them; and using their influence to give weight and acceptance to their labours. And why should not this be the duty of princes, at all times; whether they will or will not attend to it? (Notes, 2 Chr. xvii. 7—9. xxx. 12.)

V. 24—26. The Jews were delivered into the hand of the Chaldeans for their sins: thus they became the prey of the mighty. It was also just in God thus to punish them, and they might in many respects be deemed “lawful captives:” and could it be expected that the victors would release them, or that they would be rescued from them? In answer to this objection, the Lord engaged, that he would take them out of the land of their terrible and powerful oppressors, contending with them, and saving Zion’s children from them; yea, retaliating their cruelties with most terrible vengeance.—Sinners are justly given up for their crimes to be slaves and captives of Satan: but Christ, having paid their ransom, delivers them from his power, and avenges their cause on this great enemy, and on his angels and servants.—But I apprehend, that under the shadow of the destruction of the Chaldean Monarchy, to make way for the deliverance of the Jews; or of the Pagan Roman empire, by means of their mutual discords, to make way for the establishment of Christianity; the dreadful judgments, which remain to be executed on the antichristian Roman empire, in order to the liberating of the church, and the restoration of Israel, are especially predicted. (Notes, ix. 13—21. xxxiv. li. 21—23. lxiii. 1—6. Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xviii. xix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We should here be all attention: for the Lord Jesus speaks to us, who inhabit these distant isles, in accents of love, united with wisdom, authority, and truth; informing us of what he has undertaken and performed for our salvation. The dignity of his person, the depth of his humiliation, the immensity of his love, the extremity of his agonies, the unsearchable riches of his grace, and the suitability of his whole character, offices, and salvation to our ruined condition, unite in warning us, “not to refuse him that speaketh:” but they equally encourage the poor trembling sinner to draw near, and entrust his soul into his gracious hands. For the Son of God became incarnate, and “obedient even to the death upon the cross,” that he might be “able to save to the uttermost all that come to God through him.” The salvation of sinners of every nation, to the glory of God the Father, was the recompence which he required when he undertook his arduous work; and which the Father was equally willing to grant him. For love to us, when enemies, moved him to give us “his only begotten Son, to be the propitiation for our sins;” whose human nature was formed in the Virgin’s womb by the power of the Holy Ghost, and preserved through life holy and undefiled, that it might be an acceptable and an all-sufficient atonement for sin: he was also carried through his sufferings, raised from the dead, exalted to the throne of glory, and perfected in every thing, which might make him “the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him.” “The sharp sword” of his mouth, his quick and penetrating word, is employed in slaying the lusts, as well as the enemies, of those who trust in him; but it will cut off all those that persist in their enmity and disobedience. His sharp arrows wound the conscience: but when the sinner submits, and supplicates mercy, he heals the wounds which he had inflicted, and the transient pain makes way for durable joy; but these arrows will rankle for ever in the consciences of those who persist in refusing to become his subjects.—It will not in the event appear a light thing, which he has effected on earth: innumerable multitudes of the tribes of Jacob, and of the Gentiles, have been raised up from the depths of guilt and misery; and, through him, their “Light and Salvation,” have now arrived at the realms of bliss, and before the throne are celebrating his praises. Numbers are continually enlightened and saved by him, in the most remote regions, whence daily accessions are made to the church triumphant: and he will be more and more the Light and Salvation of the Gentiles, till “all kings shall fall down before Him, and all nations shall do him service;” “because of the LORD that is faithful, and the Holy One of Israel who chooseth him.”—These considerations may encourage and instruct his ministers. We should not despond, because of the contempt, reproach, or ill success with which we meet. We should rather be made more instant in prayer, and more diligent in using every means, by which we may be rendered as polished shafts, and suitable instruments, for his work. If we seem to “labour and spend our strength for nothing;” we should remember that comparatively our labours are of small value, and easily overpaid; that they may prove more useful than we suppose; and that “our judgment is with the LORD, and our work with our God.” And if there should be no gathering of sinners to Christ through our ministry; yet the Lord will honour those that honour him, and welcome them at length, and say to each of them, “Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.” He will also be our Strength and our sure Pro-

The LORD Messiah shews, that the Jews were rejected through their obstinate wickedness and unbelief; declares his power and fitness for his work; and tector: and if he employ us in rescuing a few souls from destruction, and in leading them to Christ for light and salvation; we ought to count it a great thing: though we should diligently labour and incessantly pray to be made more extensively useful.

V. 7—15.

Even the Redeemer, who spake as never man spake, seemed often in his personal ministry, "to labour in vain" and "to spend his strength for nought:" and his sufferings and death will eventually increase the condemnation of numbers who hear his gospel. He was, and still is, despised and abhorred by the nation, to which he was sent, and by mankind in general: and many rulers have opposed or new-modelled his gospel, and made his truths and ordinances subservient to their political purposes; as if he were indeed their Servant, instead of their Lord! Yet is he glorious, and shall be glorified: all judgment is administered by Him, and all power is in his hand to fulfil his great designs. The Father "heareth him in an acceptable time, and in a day of salvation;" and he has said, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession:" and whilst some are broken to pieces with his iron rod; others, even kings and princes, shall arise to behold him, and fall down to worship him, as given "for a Covenant to the people, and to establish the earth." We also, whom he employs as "workers together with him;" while "we beseech our fellow-sinners, not to receive the grace of God in vain," "giving no offence in any thing, that our ministry be not blamed;" may assure them, that now, (when the Gospel is preached to them,) is "the accepted time and the day of salvation;" (Notes, 2 Cor. vi. 1—10;) seeing we speak in his name, who ever lives to intercede effectually for all, that come through him to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God. (Note, Heb. vi. 23—25.) In the persevering use of these means, we may hope at length to have our prayers answered; and that the Lord Jesus will himself speak to the prisoners of Satan, and say, "Go forth, shew yourselves;" and that many of them will appear in the way to Zion, and learn to feed, as they go forward, upon the spiritual provisions of his gospel. Then our business will be, carefully to prepare food for them, by the faithful preaching of the word, and by duly administering his ordinances; and to cast up, and make plain his highways, and remove all stumbling-blocks out of them. But let those, who are setting out in this heavenly pilgrimage, remember, that if "they follow on to know the LORD," (Note, Hos. vi. 1—3,) he himself will both feed and guide them, by the springs of grace and consolation: and then they will neither hunger, nor thirst, nor miss their road, nor be tempted above what they are able; but arrive safe at their journey's end. And, whilst heaven resounds with joy over sinners from every quarter, brought to repentance and faith in Christ; surely we on earth also should join in their songs of praise, anticipating, in the midst of our afflictions the comforts pre-speaks of his voluntary humiliation and patient sufferings, as assured of being delivered, justified, and rendered victorious over all enemies, 1—9. He encourages afflicted and tempted believers, and denounces the ruin of presumptuous transgressors, 10, 11.

pared by our merciful God for his church and people. (Notes and P. O. Luke xv. 1—10.)

V. 16—26.

Alas! through sin and unbelief, and by means of sore conflicts, temptations, and distresses, we are often disposed to complain and despond, both respecting our own concerns, and those of religion at large. This is both dishonourable to God and uncomfortable to ourselves, and we are very criminal in yielding to it. The strongest love of the most indulgent mother bears no comparison to the everlasting love of Christ to his church, which he has purchased with "the travail of his soul," and to whom he gives "his flesh to be meat indeed, and his blood to be drink indeed." As far as we have scriptural evidence, that we belong to this ransomed flock, we may be as sure that he will never forsake us, as that he will never forget his Zion. Our names are engraven on his hands and on his heart; and he has not only assured us, that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against his church," but that none shall ever pluck his sheep out of his almighty hands. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure," and "rejoice in the hope of the glory of God."—And let us wait and pray, and use our whole influence, and concur earnestly with those, who having more influence employ it, in using proper means for promoting the fulfilment of all these glorious prophecies. By faith and in hope we may lift up our eyes, and behold multitudes from every land, gathering together to replenish and adorn the church. We may view the whole of those nations, where Christianity is professed, (which at present are in many places very "desolate, and a land of destruction,") filled with true believers: we may behold these bounds of the Redeemer's kingdom broken down, in answer to the prayers of Zion's children, complaining that "the place is too strait for them:" we may imagine the despised and forlorn condition of the church exchanged for such liberty, prosperity, light, holiness, and honour, as baffle description. We may hear the signal given, the ensign erected, the sons and daughters of the church brought in from every quarter; and kings, and queens, and all the nobles of the earth, vying with each other, who shall shew most honour to true godliness, and do most service to the cause of Christ their Lord. We may view Satan, that mighty and terrible one, deprived of his prey, seized, bound, cast into the bottomless pit, and not allowed to "deceive the nations any more:" (Note, Rev. xx. 1—6;) and all those powers, that have combined to enslave, corrupt, and persecute the church, made to "feed on their own flesh," and to be drunken with their own blood," by his power, who will contend with all that contend with his people, and avenge them upon their enemies; that all the earth may know, that our Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty One of Jacob.—Let us therefore seek for ourselves complete redemption from the power of Satan, "the god of this world:" then we may rejoice both in the hope of our own final salvation, and also of the final victory on earth.

of that cause which we favour. And we may consider every effort that we make, to rescue our fellow-sinners, as in a small and remote degree, helping to bring forward that great revolution, which will cause increasing joy in heaven to holy angels, and to "the spirits of just men" made perfect."

NOTES.

CHAP. L. V. 1—3. The preceding chapter concluded with predictions, which refer to the recovery of Israel from their present dispersions, as well as to the deliverance of the church from antichristian tyranny. (Notes, xlix. 18—23.) This relates to the cause of that dispersion. The Lord had espoused the church of Israel, (the mother of the individuals of that nation,) by the covenant ratified with her at mount Sinai: but she has long been like a divorced woman; especially since the nation "crucified the Lord" of glory. The law required him who put away his wife, to give her a bill of divorcement, assigning the causes of her dismissal, which frequently were very frivolous. (Notes, Deut. xxiv. 1—4. Jer. iii. 1.) But if the Jews should produce the bill of their mother's divorcement, it would appear, that she was not put away on trivial pretences; but for her violation of the covenant, for her idolatries and iniquities, especially for crucifying the promised Messiah, and obstinately opposing his gospel, and persecuting his disciples. It was also customary, on some occasions, for children to be sold into slavery, by the parent's consent to satisfy his creditors, or by a judicial sentence. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Ex. xxi. 2—11. 2 Kings iv. 1. Neh. v. 1—5.) Thus the Jews were sold into the hands of the Romans, and have been enslaved and oppressed ever since: but it cannot be imagined that the Lord had sold them on any such account: indeed they were punished as criminals for their iniquities, and had none to blame but themselves for their miseries. For when the Lord came, even the eternal "Word, who from the beginning was "with God, and was God," to his own people, "his own" "received him not:" (Notes, John i. 1—3. 10—13:) when he called them to follow him, they answered him not. And wherefore were they thus regardless and disobedient? because they expected a mighty temporal prince and conqueror; and he appeared "in the form of a servant," to be their spiritual Redeemer: whence they concluded, that he was not able to deliver them, or to defend them against the Romans. But could they behold his unparalleled miracles, and think that his hand was so shortened that it could not redeem? or that he had no power to deliver? (Note, lix. 1, 2.) These proved him to be the same JEHOVAH, and to possess the same power, which had formerly dried up the Red Sea and desolated the rivers of Egypt, turning their waters into blood, and causing the fish to die and putrefy: the same power, which caused the tremendous plague of hail, and the more tremendous plague of darkness: and which was able at any time to repeat or vary these miracles, and to clothe the heavens with darkness, and make sackcloth their covering. This may refer to the darkness which covered the land, during Christ's crucifixion; as that was an apt emblem of the dreadful vengeance, about to be poured out on his crucifiers. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 45. Mark xv. 33.) The power which rebuked the tempestuous winds and waves, extorted obedience from legions of unclean spirits, and called the dead out of their graves, was evidently adequate to effect any deliverance, and to equal and exceed all which had been done for Israel by the Lord, from the beginning to that day.

V. 4. In the preceding verses, it is here supposed, that Christ spake as JEHOVAH; here he speaks as Mediator: for there is not the least intimation of any change in the Speaker; and the things spoken in the following verses are inapplicable in many respects to Isaiah; for they refer to distant events, and evidently accord to Christ. (Note, 5, 6.) If indeed we believe Jesus to be God and Man in one person, we shall not be surprised to find him sometimes speaking, or spoken of, as the Lord God, and at other times as Man, and the Servant of JEHOVAH. This is frequent in the New Testament, and there are undeniable instances of it in the Old. (Notes, xl. 9—17. xlii. 1—4. Zech. ii. 6—9.)—The encouraging nature and tendency of our Lord's ministry, his condescension, and his unrivalled qualifications as a Teacher, rendered the obstinate unbelief of the Jews inexcusable. He was especially qualified and commissioned by the Father, to declare those truths, which give seasonable comfort to the broken heart and wounded conscience, and to those who are weary of sin, or harassed with temptations and afflictions. (Notes, lxi. 1—3. Matt. xi. 28—30.) This characterized his ministry, and the gospel-dispensation. And as "the Spirit of the Lord God was "upon him," that he might "speak as never man spake," so the same divine influence wakened him morning by morning, to pour out his prayers, to preach the gospel, and to receive and deliver the whole will of the Father, with that exact attention which the learner pays, or he that is learned has paid, to the voice of the teacher.

V. 5, 6. How far Isaiah, as the type of Christ, was exposed to these indignities, we cannot tell, as nothing of the kind is recorded concerning him. (Note, i. 1.) But the history of Jesus compels us to explain the whole of him exclusively.—Spitting in any one's presence has, in the East, been always considered, as an intolerable expression of contempt: how much more to spit in a man's face! Before the high priest, chief priests, and rulers, the servants and others repeatedly spat in the face of our adorable Redeemer. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 27—31.)—The perfect holiness of the Saviour disposed him to open his ears to every commandment of the Father, and to render absolute obedience, through difficulties, temptations, and sufferings, even to the death upon the cross. (Notes, Ps. xl. 6—8. Heb. x. 5—10. xii. 2, 3.) So that he turned not back, but willingly submitted to repeated scourgings, and to the insults of the officers of the high priest, and of the soldiers of Herod and Pilate, who plucked off his beard, and spat in his face, as the utmost expressions of their scorn and derision. (Marg. Ref. p.)

V. 7—9. Our blessed Saviour steadily went through his complicated and most intense sufferings, by faith in the promises of the Father. He was assured of support and deliverance, and that he should effect the purpose for which he suffered, and not be confounded by disappointment. Therefore he “set his face like a flint,” in immovable constancy and intrepidity. (Notes, Jer. i. 17—19. xv. 19—21. Ez. ii. 6—8. iii. 4—11, vv. 8, 9.) He knew that his cause was good and his righteousness perfect, and that all his accusers would be found liars; for the Lord was at hand to justify him. Who then would dare to contend with him, or to lay any thing to his charge? Let them come forward, and stand together before Him, whose right it was to decide the cause: for he knew, that God would not condemn him; and who else could? Every one therefore that attempted it would soon lose all his credit and distinction, and become contemptible as an old moth-eaten garment.—This was verified in the resurrection and ascension of Christ, and by the pouring out of the Spirit upon his disciples; in the entire abolition of the authority of the Jewish high priest and council, who first condemned Christ; and in the subversion of the Roman empire, by whose authority he was delivered up to be crucified.—The justification of Christ, our Surety, was an earnest of the justification of that whole body which he represented; and every true believer may on this ground give a similar challenge to all his enemies. (Notes, Ps. cxliii. 2. Rom. viii. 35—39.)

V. 10, 11. The darkness of temptation, and the anguish of body and mind, through which the Redeemer passed to his glory, forms a proper ground of consolation to his suffering people. (Notes, Heb. ii. 16—18. iv. 14—16.) He here addresses especially the Christian church, or the Jewish converts, in the midst of the calamities which befell them, about the time when Jerusalem was desolated: but the words are equally applicable to afflicted and distressed and tempted Christians in every age. They fear the Lord, and obey the voice of Christ, his elect Servant, (Note, xlii. 1—4,) as made known to them by his word and ministers; and accordingly repent and believe, and follow after holiness: yet they often walk in darkness; they may be exposed to continued afflictions, and unkind treatment from the world; and experience distressing temptations, conflicts, fears, and discouragements; and not be able to obtain the light of prosperity or consolation. But let them trust in the mercy, truth, power, and wisdom of the Lord; and stay themselves upon him as their covenanted Friend, for direction, support, and deliverance; let them wait for him, and he will not fail their expectations. ‘This shews, that it is a rare thing, that any should ‘obey aright God’s true ministers, though they labour to ‘bring them from hell to heaven.’—On the other hand, those who amuse themselves with their own devices; who rely on their own wisdom, strength, or righteousness; who exult in worldly prosperity, or sensual pleasures; or who are pleased with schemes of infidelity, hypocrisy, superstition, or enthusiasm; refuse the light of the divine word, and kindle a fire of their own in its stead. They compass themselves about with its sparks, and walk by the glimmering light of its blaze: but these will soon be extinguished together; and, by the power and wrath of Christ,

God encourages his people, by the example of Abraham, to trust in him; and promises them comfort, 1—3. He contrasts the certainty and perpetuity of his righteousness and salvation, with the short continuance of the visible creation, and the feebleness of persecutors; and warns his people against the dread of reproach, 4—8. The church calls on God to renew his wonderful works in her behalf; and receives assurances of comfort and prosperity, with a rebuke for her unbelief and fear of man, 9—16. Israel, in past and present distresses, is assured of deliverance, and of the punishment of her oppressors, 17—23.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It will appear, in the great day of account, that the destruction of sinners was chargeable upon themselves alone. God never deprived any of his rational creatures of their advantages, except for sin.—This was the cause of angels being cast out of heaven, and man out of paradise; and it is the only source of all the miseries whith we feel or fear. For this we are, as it were, sold into slavery to Satan and our lusts, and “sin reigneth unto death.” (Marg. Ref. b, c.) But, after all our violations of the divine law, we shall yet be happy if we do not reject the gospel: for he, who might have come with irresistible power to execute vengeance upon us, has graciously appeared, in our nature and as our Brother, to save sinners; and he calls upon each of us to believe and follow him. Wherefore then are men so backward to hear and obey his call? Has he not power to save and to destroy? Did not his miracles proclaim his authority over all nature and all creatures, even during his humiliation on earth? The darkness and prodigies, which attended his sufferings and death, proclaimed that “truly this was the Son of God,” and anticipated the evidence of his glorious resurrection. Has his exaltation to the throne of glory at all shortened his hand that he cannot redeem, or deprived him of power to deliver? and cannot he, who shall shortly raise the dead, destroy by fire this visible world, and destroy the wicked with everlasting perdition; make up to us all we can lose, and support us under all we can suffer for his sake?—His mercy and condescension also are equal to his power and majesty. He received from the Father those encouraging words, which he once spoke in person, and now delivers to us by his ministers. Still he calls “the weary and heavy-laden to come to him, that they may find rest to “their souls:” his word affords seasonable cordials for the mourning, the tempted, and the discouraged; he knows how to apply them to their hearts by his comforting Spirit: and he is ready, from day to day, to hear their prayers and alleviate their distresses. In many of these things, he is the pattern for his ministers to follow. They should seek to the Lord God to “give them the tongue of the learned” that they may know how to speak” seasonably to the afflicted and broken-hearted: they must “awake morning “by morning,” that they may study and learn, and then teach, the word of God, and become “workmen that need “not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.” Their ear also must be opened to hear, and their heart prepared to obey, the commandments of God, that they may become examples to the flock. And, as the incarnate Son of God was not rebellious, and shrunk not back from obedience in his arduous undertaking, which required him to endure pains, shame, and agonies unknown; surely we should be willing to endure hardship as his soldiers, and not decline any obedience as too self-denying, or any suffering as too sharp, to which he calls us. “Let us then “go forth with him out of the camp, bearing his reproach:” and if we trust in his righteousness, copy his example, and suffer for his sake, the Lord God will help us too; and we may “set our faces as a flint,” assured “that God will “justify” and deliver us, and confound all our adversaries and persecutors. Let then the Christian, “who fear-“eth the LORD, and obeyeth the voice” of his beloved Son, take courage, even “if he walk in darkness, and “have no light:” let him confide in God to conduct him through every gloomy scene of affliction, temptation, and disconsolation; and through the vale of death, to the everlasting light and joy of heaven. But as for those, who oppose, neglect, despise, or pervert this great salvation; their prosperity, confidence, and joy will be only as the expiring blaze, and the vanishing sparks of a fire of thorns: and their boasted illuminations will light them down to the regions of darkness and despair. (Notes, Prov. iv. 18, 19. Ec. vii. 2—6. xi. 9, 10.)

(Note, l. 4.) Some suppose the captives at Babylon to be intended: but the scene appears to be laid in after times, and that captivity merely to have given occasion to the address; and the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon was a shadow of far more extensive and important blessings. The desolations of Jerusalem by the Romans, the massacres of Jews which attended and succeeded it, and the rejection of that nation, must needs cause great heaviness to others of the Jewish converts to Christianity, as well as to St. Paul; and they might conclude that the Lord's choice of Israel was finally vacated. (Notes, Rom. ix. 1—3. xi. 1—6.) The ten persecutions in the first three centuries were very trying to the faith and patience of the primitive Christians. The long continued oppressions, under which the church has laboured from antichristian persecutors; and the prevalence of superstition, idolatry, impiety, infidelity, and every kind of iniquity to this day, in nations professing Christianity; have been, and are, very discouraging, to all those who love truth and holiness. There is also a time approaching and very near, when the dispersed of Israel will need some ground in their own scriptures, to encourage their hope of re-admission into the church; and consolatory topicks, suited to these several purposes, are here suggested.—Those “who follow after righteousness and seek the LORD,” are addressed; they have begun to desire and seek the knowledge of God, and expect happiness in his favour; and they are using the appointed means of obtaining righteousness, (i. e. of being justified and sanctified,) in order to it. Persons of this character are called upon to hearken to the voice of God, and to recollect the rock and the quarry, so to speak, whence the first stones of the whole building of the nation of Israel were taken. God called Abraham, an idolater, when advanced in years, with only Sarah his wife to attend him: and, when it was become contrary to the ordinary course of nature for him to have children by her, the Lord, according to his promise, blessed them; and increased them into an innumerable multitude. (Notes, Gen. xvii. 17. xviii. 9—15. xxi. 1—4. Ez. xxxiii. 24—29. Rom. iv. 18—22.) So that he could, and certainly would, recover his church from the lowest condition: he would comfort the remnant of believers, by reviving true religion in those places which had been waste and desert; and by planting them, like the garden of Eden, with every beautiful, ex-smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but ^xmy salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished.

7 ^yHearken unto me, ^zye that know righteousness, the people ^ain whose heart is my law; ^bfear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings.

8 For ^cthe moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool; but ^dmy righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation.

V. 4—6. Here God our Saviour speaks to Israel, and calls on them to attend, and carefully notice his words: for he would promulgate his laws, establish his ordinances, and declare his truths, among other nations; who, being instructed by his holy word, would become his subjects and obey his commandments. (Notes, ii. 2—5. xlii. 1—4.) His righteousness, as imputed to believers for justification, and his grace as imparted for sanctification, and the performance of his ancient promises, were now brought near; the glad tidings of his complete salvation were gone forth; (for the scene is laid in the primitive times of Christianity;) his “arms,” or his universal authority and almighty power, would execute just judgment among the nations; and the most remote regions would learn to wait on him, and trust in him as alone able to save them. He would not fail, or be discouraged, till this had generally taken effect: for his salvation, and the righteousness connected with it, would continue, not only after the ruin of successive generations of persecutors and opposers; but even after the heavens and the earth were grown old and vanished, and all their inhabitants were destroyed like the meanest insects: yea, they should never be abolished to all eternity. V. 7, 8. There seems to be here an advance, in describing the character of the persons addressed; perhaps intimating, that they “who follow after righteousness, and seek the LORD,” will “know righteousness,” and obtain “the full assurance of hope;” that “being justified by faith they have peace with God,” and enjoy his favour: having his law written in their hearts, loving it and delighting to obey it. (Notes, 1—3. Ps. xxxvii. 29—31. xl. 6—8. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. Rom. vii. 22—25. Phil. iii. 8—11. Heb. viii. 7—13. x. 5—10.) This confidence would be peculiarly desirable, and almost necessary, in order to their victory over the fear of man, especially in times of persecution: and they are encouraged not to fear the reproaches or revilings of those, who “spake all manner of evil against them falsely for Christ’s sake,” and then made their calumnies the pretext for their cruelties. (Notes, 12—14. Matt. v. 10—12. Heb. xi. 24—26. 35—38. xiii. 9—14. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.) For all their persecutors would soon decay, and perish like a moth-eaten garment: but the righteousness and salvation of the LORD would maintain their ground on earth through all generations; as well as continue for ever the felicity of the believer, who here suffered for adhering to them. (Notes, 4—6. xlv. 15—17. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Dan. ix. 24. 2 Thes. ii. 16, 17. Heb. v. 7—10.)

V. 9—11. The church, encouraged by these most gracious assurances, calls upon her great Redeemer to awake and exert himself for her deliverance. She calls him, “The Arm of the LORD;” or his power: and Christ is the Power, as well as the Word and Wisdom, of God. (Notes, liii. 1. 1 Cor. i. 17—24.) She intreats him to “put on strength, as in the ancient days,” and as in the former generations of Israel: for was he not the same almighty King, who had destroyed Egypt and Pharaoh, and weakened that formidable power of which the dragon was an emblem? (Notes, xxvii. 1. Ps. lxxiv. 13—17.) Was not he the same, who had divided the Red Sea, that his redeemed people might pass over? (Note, lxxiii. 11—14.) In this confidence the church rests assured, that the people, whom he has now redeemed with his blood, as well as by his power, will obtain a joyful deliverance from every enemy.—As the Jews of old returned from Babylon to Zion with songs of joy and praise; so will that nation be again received into the church, and restored to the promised land: and the whole church shall long rejoice and prosper, freed from those enemies, oppressions, and corruptions, which have so long harassed her; and enjoy such peace, and purity, and light, and felicity, as shall render her earthly state almost like heaven, where alone these expressions can be fully answered. (Notes, xxv. 6—8. xxxv. 8—10. Jer. xxx. 19—22. xxxi. 10—14. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. x. 5—12. Rev. xix. 1—7. xx. 1—6.)

V. 12—14. The Lord here engages to be the Comforter of his church: and in that case, what occasion had she to fear wretched, dying men, who are cut down, and wither as the grass? (Notes, xl. 6—8. l. 7—9.) It must therefore be the effect of unbelief, forgetfulness of the Lord her Maker, and of the power engaged on her side, that she was continually terrified by the fury of oppressors, as if they were about entirely to destroy her; whereas their fury would speedily vanish, and be no more found. (Notes, Dan. iii. 16—18. Matt. x. 27, 28. Acts xii. 1—4. 20—24.)—But she complained and was alarmed, like a person who is exiled or in captivity, and was in great haste to be set at liberty, lest she should perish in the dungeon, or by famine.—“He marcheth on with speed, who cometh to set free the captive, &c.” Cyrus, if understood of the temporal redemption from the captivity of Babylon; in the spiritual sense, the Messiah. Bp. Lowth. The Hebrew runs plainly thus: “The captive exile shall be quickly delivered: he shall not die in the pit,” (or prison) “neither shall his bread fail.” Lowth. Either of these renderings contains simply an encouragement, and not a reproof: but the context leads us to think, that this also was implied; and that the persons concerned, while earnestly waiting and seeking for deliverance, were in a measure impatient, and weak in faith, and ready to conclude that the blessing, so long delayed, would never be vouchsafed, though expressly promised in the sacred scriptures. Thus pious Christians, who have always grieved over the corruptions of the church, and longed for deliverance from the spiritual captivity of Antichrist, and for the predicted millennium; have been tempted, by the failure of many zealous attempts, to which they foreboded full success, and by the delay of an answer to their earnest prayers, to conclude that such a time will never arrive; and that superstition, ignorance, false doctrine, and wickedness, will prevail to the end of the world.—‘The captive °must starve and die in his dungeon, if not hastily liberated.’ (Marg. Ref. a.)

V. 15, 16. The church, or the prophet, had called on the Lord, who had divided the Red Sea; and he here answers to that call. (Note, 9—11.) He was still the same omnipotent Protector of his people, as when he brought Israel out of Egypt.—But the latter verse must be addressed, either to Isaiah or to the Messiah whom he predicted, and in some respects typified. The Lord had put words in the prophet’s mouth, which he delivered to Israel, to encourage the faith and direct the prayers of his people; and he had preserved him, as under the shadow of his hand, that, with the converts made by his ministry, he might “plant the heavens,” as with “trees of righteousness,” and “establish the earth,” or the land, which had been greatly shaken in the reign of Ahaz. It is, however, obvious, that this interpretation falls exceedingly short of the energetick language employed; which nothing can fully answer, but the glorious effects of the Messiah’s coming into the world, being carried through his labours and sufferings, advanced to the mediatorial throne, and sending his gospel to all nations, with the Holy Spirit to render it successful; thus replenishing heaven with holy inhabitants, establishing the moral state of the earth, and owning the despised church, as a people near and dear to him. (Notes, xlv. 18, 19. xlix. 1—6. l. 4. lix. 20, 21. lx. 15—22. lxi. 1—3.)—Plant the heavens. (16) “Stretch out °the heavens.” Bp. Lowth. This rendering needs an entire change in the Hebrew text, without the least authority. Besides, the “stretching out the heaven,” was past, but the “planting of the heavens,” was the special future work of the Messiah.

V. 17—20. The Lord here seems to address the Jews in their present dispersions. Jerusalem, the mother of that people, had indeed drunk the cup of the Lord’s fury, and wrung out the very dregs of it. The terrible effects of his indignation, against that devoted city, are represented by those of a poisoned or medicated potion, which a criminal was obliged to drink off; and which produced rage, despair, and anguish, or trembling and fainting. (Notes, xlix. 24—26. Ps. lx. 1—3. lxxv. 8. Jer. xxv. 15—17. Zech. xii. 2—5. Matt. xxvi. 36—41.) In this condition none of her children were at hand, or were able, to lead, uphold, or take care of her. That is, the most desolating and stupendous judgments would be poured out upon Jerusalem, by pestilence, discord, famine, and the Roman sword: and none of the neighbours would sympathize with the poor Jews, or attempt to comfort them; but would rather insult over their miseries and increase them. Nor among themselves, would any of Jerusalem’s sons be able to help themselves, or defend their city: but they would lie fainting and dying in multitudes at the head of every street: and, continuing unhumbled and untamed, they would resemble the wild bull, when taken in the hunter’s toils, furiously struggling to extricate himself, and only entangling himself the more. Thus would they suffer by the furious rebuke of the Lord, for rejecting and crucifying their promised Messiah.—This seems to relate immediately to the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the miseries which attended that awful event. But the calamities of the Jews continue to this day; and they yet remain unhumbled under them; which circumstance shews that they, and not persecuted Christians, are here primarily intended.—‘Two things: (19) that is, desolation by famine, and °destruction by the sword.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 21—23. The afflicted Jews, who have been so long made drunken by temporal and spiritual judgments, “more “than with wine,” or in a more stupifying manner, are here encouraged to expect deliverance. (Note, xxix. 9—12.) Mercy is yet in store for the nation of Israel, for their fathers’ sake. (Note, Rom. xi. 25—32.) The Lord will yet plead their cause, and punish their oppressors, who have so long treated them with equal cruelty and indignity; trampling them down as the mire in the streets, and attempting to domineer over their souls as well as their bodies.—It is well known, that in those countries where the inquisition is established, numbers of Jews dissemble their religion to escape its cruelties; yet they abjectly submit to be thus trampled on, for gain by traffick there: and this forms a remarkable accomplishment of the prophecy. (Notes, Deut. iv. 25—28. xxviii. 64—67. Josh. x. 24, 25.) Neither the obstinacy, nor the sufferings, of the Jews at Babylon, were in any measure equal to what they have been since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: the scene of the prophecy leads us to this interpretation: and those popish countries, where they have been most grievously oppressed, will hereafter be punished with similar severity. (Notes, xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Ez. xxxix. 17—29. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Mic. vii. 18—20. Zech. xii. 2—8. Rev. xviii. xix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—8.

The consolations of the gospel are proposed to men, not by name, but by character; and from the first dawns of divine life in the soul, till its completion in glory, the true believer, and he alone, “follows after righteousness and seeks the LORD.” (Note, Hos. vi. 1—3. Phil. iii. 12—14.)—As it is profitable to consider, from what small and unpromising beginnings, the blessing of God has increased and enlarged the church hitherto, and revived pure religion when it appeared almost expiring; so it is very useful for believers to consider frequently, “the rock whence they were hewn, and the hole of the pit whence they were digged.” We should frequently and deeply reflect upon our natural depravity, guilt, and misery; upon the enmity and hardness of our hearts, the rebellion of our wills, the pollution of our imaginations and desires, and the crimes of our lives past: we should recollect the bad habits which we had contracted, through an early entrance and a long continuance in sin; the ungodly connexions which we had formed, the prejudices that we had imbibed, and all the circumstances peculiar to us, which tended to aggravate our guilt, and to render our conversion improbable: and we should often recall to mind how we struggled against conviction, and would gladly have quieted our consciences without parting with our sins, or without accepting the salvation of Christ. These reviews, when duly made, powerfully tend to keep the heart humble, and the conscience awake and tender; they repress boastings and complaints, and excite thankfulness to him who has made us to differ: they are suited to satisfy the discouraged believer, that a saving change has taken place, and to animate his hopes and prayers, for all which yet remains to be done in and for him: they render Christ and his love and salvation

joy occasioned by the Gospel; and the knowledge, peace, and purity of the Christian church; with suitable exhortations, 7—12. The humiliation and exaltation of Christ, and the success of his cause, 13—15.

more precious to our souls; and give energy to our attempts and prayers for the conversion of ungodly relatives, and for that of sinners all around us. Let us then frequently thus review our life past, that we may renew our repentance, our joyful praises, and our earnest supplications; that our souls may become like “the garden of the LORD,” being filled with all the “fruits of righteousness,” which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory of “God;” and that we may be, as it were in miniature, what the church on earth will shortly become; and possess an internal evidence of the power of our God to effect that glorious and stupendous change in the state of the visible church and of the world; as well as an earnest of that further change, which must yet take place in our bodies and souls, previous to our full enjoyment of the “Paradise of God,” where only “joy and gladness shall be found, thanksgiving and the voice of melody;” and from which “sorrow and mourning shall flee away.”—Our meditations should also be extended to the former condition of this our most favoured nation: blessed be God, that the Gospel of Christ has come, and does rest, among us for the light of our souls; “his righteousness is brought nigh, his salvation is gone forth” in the midst of us; he is revealed as our Lawgiver and Judge, and he is become the Righteousness and Salvation of those who trust in him and wait for him. Let us then rely on his merits, his grace, and power, and receive the law from his hands, as the rule of our obedience: and thus we shall be safe and happy, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up; for “his salvation shall be for ever, and his righteousness shall not be abolished.” But if we would expect that solemn season with comfort, and have confidence in death and judgment; we must press forwards in the ways of God, that, having his “law in our hearts,” we may know our interest in his righteousness. Then we need fear no enemy or catastrophe: our reverential fear of God, and our holy dread and abhorrence of sin, will arm us against the ensnaring fear of man: and it is our infirmity and fault, if we fear the revilings or rage of any man or set of men, who despise and hate us for the sake of Christ and his righteousness; seeing he is our ever-present and all-sufficient Protector. We can indeed expect no other than reproach in this wicked world: but our persecutors will soon die and perish. Should we be cut off by their rage, or die before them, we shall soon be out of their reach: and if we be spared, they will soon lose their power of molesting us.—The cause of Christ survives one generation of opposers after another: and the believer will survive all his revilers, and enjoy his portion whilst they are in “outer darkness.” Let us then strive against our fears, and give up ourselves unto prayer: and let us take courage in reviewing the wonders which God performed for his church of old.

V. 9—23.

Christians may not only plead with God, that he divided the Red sea, and destroyed the Egyptians to deliver Israel: but may advert to the more glorious triumphs of his grace, at the day of Pentecost, and afterwards in the conversion of unnumbered multitudes to Him, whom they just before had crucified, and who, being risen again and ascended into heaven, poured out his Spirit to work the astonishing change. Compared with those glorious days, “the Arm of the LORD” seems now to sleep; but he only waits to be awakened by our fervent prayers. He will yet “put on strength as in ancient days;” he will destroy the power of Antichrist, and bind up the old dragon, who has hitherto deceived the nations. Then “the redeemed of the LORD” shall be delivered from captivity, Zion shall resound with songs of praise, and the gladness of believers on earth shall form a sweet antepast to the everlasting joy of heaven. Our lot indeed is not cast in that happy period; yet the Lord is our Comforter, if true Christians: and should we then think ourselves so defenceless, as to fear a man that shall die! Surely this must arise from our unbelief, and forgetfulness of “the LORD our Maker, “who hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the “foundations of the earth:” and we are very reprehensible, if we be “solicitous continually every day,” because of the prevalence of infidelity and impiety, as if the enemies of godliness were ready to complete its ruin. The case is far otherwise: they are compassing their own perdition, and ere long their place shall know them no more. Let us then make haste to escape the confines of sin, and to return from our state of distance and banishment from God: but let us wait patiently our time of deliverance from oppression and calamities, assured that the Lord will hasten it in due season. If we be saved by Jesus from the pit of hell, he will not let us perish in any other pit; and if we have learned to feed upon “the Bread of life,” our bread even for this life cannot fail: our bondage and exile on earth will soon end; our souls will be rescued from the prison of our sinful bodies; and our bodies at length redeemed from the bondage of corruption, and “so shall we be ever with the Lord.” Let us then rest our souls on his word; that, having been “planted as trees of righteousness” in his courts below, we shall at length be transplanted to heaven, where to flourish for ever in that garden of the Lord. (Note, Is. xcii. 13—15.) Nor should they despair, who have ere drunk the deepest of “the cup of the Lord’s indignation:” for his severest judgments often introduce his tenderest compassions. Yet, as long as men are hardened, apified, or rendered outrageous and desperate, by afflictions, there is little appearance of a happy event.—When the wrath of God rests upon transgressors, no children or friends can comfort them; and all their efforts to extricate themselves, involve them in deeper guilt and misery. Let sinners then remember these things, and learn by their present sufferings to submit to God, to confess their crimes, to acknowledge his justice, and to seek his mercy. Let all recollect, that our rebellious murmurs tend only to increase and prolong our sorrows. Let us look on the poor Jews with compassion, and endeavour to administer to their comfort, and not add to their miseries; and above all, let us seek and pray for their conversion. And let those powerful tyrants, who lord it over that people, or others of the human race; who enslave their bodies, or usurp authority over their consciences, remember, that the Lord will plead their cause, and punish their impenitent oppressors, with greater misery and contempt, either in this world, or in that which is to come.

NOTES.

CHAP. LII. V. 1. The latter part of the preceding chapter describes the desolations of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the miseries of the Jews to this day; more exactly than either those inflicted by the Chaldeans, or those which they endured under Antiochus Epiphanes, which were of short duration: and this chapter is evidently a continuation of the subject. There can therefore be no good reason to restrict the interpretation to the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon.—The sacred writer indeed treats his subject as a prophet and a poet, and not as an orator or historian: yet some degree of method, and some order in the series of his predictions, may be expected, as well in his writings, as in those of the other prophets. He had spoken of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib; and then of the return of the Jews from Babylon: intermingling predictions of more spiritual and generally interesting events. But nothing can be supposed more interesting than the future restoration of Israel to the church and to their own land: no event is more evidently predicted in scripture: and the Jews generally expect the termination of their present miseries; though they think that it will be effected by the advent of the Messiah, whom they suppose not yet come. This restoration is far more intimately connected with those things, which relate to the person and work of Christ, than the deliverance from Babylon was: and it is so agreeable to the context, that I apprehend it ought not to be overlooked in explaining this passage.—The church had called upon her Redeemer, “as “the Arm of the LORD,” to “awake and put on strength” for her deliverance: (Note, li. 9—11:) here she is called upon to awake, and to “be strong in the Lord,” that she may apprehend that liberty, which was preparing for her. She is represented as a sorrowful woman, and called Zion, “Jerusalem, the holy city:” but she is exhorted to put on her beautiful garments as a rejoicing bride; being assured that the uncircumcised and unclean should no more enter into her, as the Chaldeans had done. (Notes, i. 25—27. lx. 1—3. 15—22. Ez. xlvi. 30—35, v. 35. Zech. xiv. 20, 21. Rev. xxi. 22—27.) But with what propriety could this be addressed to Jerusalem after the captivity? Antiochus Epiphanes soon profaned the city and temple, by every method which his impious cruelty could devise: after that event, Pompey the Roman general took possession of the city, and committed many profanations, and even entered into the holy of holies: and at length the city and whole nation, as unclean, were given up into the hands of the uncircumcised Romans, to be utterly profaned and desolated. (Note, Dan. ix. 25—27, v. 27.)—The New Testament church therefore must chiefly be intended, and probably with especial reference to its last and purest ages: for there are clear predictions given, that after the termination of the antichristian tyranny, the restoration of the Jews, more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean.

and the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles; the church shall continue in permanent peace and purity, till the eve of the general judgment: then indeed some apostasies will take place, and the apostate nations shall make war upon the city of God; but they shall fail of success, and perish in the attempt. (Notes, Rev. xx. 1—10.)

V. 2, 3. Jerusalem, or Zion, is here represented as a captive in chains, trampled in the dust; (li. 23;) but she is called upon to arise and shake herself from her dust, to sit down as a queen upon a throne, and to divest herself of all the badges of her former servitude. The Jews indeed had been sold into bondage for those sins, which could in no sense profit them, and they might be said to have “sold themselves,” or “to have been sold for nought;” (Note, 1. 1—3;) and all the calamities of the Christian church have been righteous visitations for her sins: but the Lord was about to redeem them by his power, without paying their oppressors any ransom for them. Cyrus extorted the power over the Jews from their oppressors, and then freely liberated them: and this may perhaps be an exact prefiguration of the future deliverance of the church and restoration of Israel.—The price paid by our Redeemer for our salvation, was “not silver, or gold, or corruptible things, but his own precious blood.” (Notes, xlv. 13, 14. 1 Pet. i. 17—21.)

Arise, and sit down, &c. (2) “Ascend thy lofty seat.” When sitting is spoken of (in the east) ‘as a posture of more than ordinary state, it ... means sitting on high, on a chair of state, or throne; for which a footstool was necessary. ... Chairs,’ (saith Sir John Chardin,) ‘are never used in Persia, but at the coronation of their kings. The king is seated in a chair of gold set with jewels, three feet high. ... This proves the propriety of the style in scripture, which always joins the footstool to the throne.’ lxvi. 1. 2 Chr. ix. 18. Ps. cx. 1.’ Bp. Lowth.

V. 4—6. The Egyptians ungratefully and unjustly enslaved the Israelites, when they went down to sojourn among them; and the Assyrians and Chaldeans afterwards grievously oppressed them without any provocation; but the Lord pleaded their cause and rescued them: (Notes, xlvii. 6. li. 21—23:) and thus he will save his church from all unrighteous persecutors; and avenge Israel on all those who oppress them. He did not authorize these cruelties; nor had he any profit from their sufferings. Those, who from age to age ruled over his people, have made them to howl by their cruel oppressions, and have then insulted them, and blasphemed the name of their God, as if he could not deliver them. (Notes, xlviii. 9—11.) Therefore his own glory required him to interpose; and he would let his people know his power, truth, and love; and that He, even JEHOVAH himself, had spoken all these predictions, (of which under their anguish of spirit they had been led to doubt,) and was ready to perform them.—Perhaps some intimation is here given, that the Jews shall in the day of their restoration know, that he, who spake to them as their Messiah, and whom they despised and crucified, was indeed their God and King. (Notes, Zech. xii. 9—14. Matt. xxiii. 37—39.)

V. 7, 8. (Note, Nah. i. 15.) The proclamation of Cyrus circulated by messengers into every place, and notified by signals, and by the voice of the watchmen, on the tops of the mountains, was but a feeble emblem of that grand event, to which the apostle appropriates this passage; namely, the preaching of the gospel to the nations of the earth. When men know their own real character and situation, and that of the world around them, in respect of God and eternity, “the feet” of those who bring these good tidings, appear beautiful; that is, the means of them: it may also intimate their holy walk and conversation. (Note, Rom. x. 12—17, v. 15.) They announce the glad tidings from heaven of pardon, peace, and salvation and “say to Zion, Thy God reigneth.” (Notes, xl. 6—8. Luke. ii. 8—14.) He rules the world with invincible power, who is Zion’s God and Saviour. The watchmen may be the same, as the messengers of glad tidings evangelists, or such as wait to receive and circulate the joyful sound. Whilst they cry aloud, that all may hear they join glad hallelujahs with their invitations and the

In proportion as the faithful preaching of the gospel is vouchsafed, true religion will be diffused and flourish.—‘The ideas ... are in their full extent evangelical: and accordingly St. Paul has, with the utmost propriety, applied this passage to the preaching of the gospel, Rom. x. 15. ‘The joyful tidings here to be proclaimed, “Thy God, O “Zion reigneth,” are the same that John the Baptist, the messenger of Christ, and that Christ himself published. “The kingdom of heaven is at hand.”’ *Bp. (Note, Rev. xviii. 4—8.)

V. 13—15. These verses introduce another subject, and properly belong to the next chapter. ‘The deliverance of ‘the Jews from the captivity of Babylon; the deliverance ‘of the Gentiles from their miserable state of ignorance ‘and idolatry; and the deliverance of mankind from the ‘captivity of sin and death,...are subordinate to one ‘another; and the two latter are shadowed out under the ‘image of the former. (Note, xlii. 1—4.) He would fulfil his whole undertaking, with consummate wisdom and complete success; so that his exaltation in heaven, and his glory on earth, would be very high. Yet his previous abasement would be proportionably deep: many would behold his sufferings with astonishment, and be offended by them. His visage would be marred by sorrow and shame, with wounds and blood, by being spit upon and crowned with thorns, and treated with indignity, more than any man’s

But he would in consequence “sprinkle many nations,” (alluding to the ceremonial law,) with his atoning blood, and by the pouring out of his Spirit, as purifying water, of which baptism would be the outward and visible sign. (Marg. Ref. p.) Opposing kings would at length be silenced by fear and astonishment, or won over to the faith; for they would see and consider such things, as they before had never heard of, or been acquainted with. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The promises of God should invigorate our efforts, to obtain the proposed blessings; and to promote that purity, peace, and enlargement of the church, which they teach us to expect.—Whilst we call on the Lord to “awake and “put on strength,” for our help and salvation; we should attend to his exhortation to bestir ourselves in doing our duty. At his call the sinner awakes from the fatal sleep of sin, and delusive dreams of earthly felicity, and discovers his abject, wretched, and enslaved condition: by his help he arises from the dust, shakes off his sloth and dejection, breaks his fetters, puts off the old corrupt nature, and puts on Christ for righteousness and sanctification. Then he appears before God in his beautiful garments; (Notes, Zech. iii. 1—4. Rom. xiii. 11—14. Gal. iii. 26—29;) his holy conversation shews him to men also, to be “a new creature;” and “being delivered from the bondage of corruption,” “sin shall no more have dominion over him.”—Multitudes indeed of the “uncircumcised in heart and “unclean” in life, in every age and place, have been within the visible church: (Notes, Jer. ix. 25, 26. Acts v. 31—53. Rom. ii. 25—29, vv. 28, 29;) but none of them are citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, not one of them can find admission into the holy city of our God above. We should therefore be diligent in “cleansing ourselves from all filthiness “of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.” The freeness of his salvation gives us abundant encouragement, in pursuing this path: and when we consider how unprofitable, yea, how pernicious to our temporal comfort, those sins are, by which men incur condemnation and enslave their souls, we shall the more value that redemption, which Christ has made, “not by corruptible things, as “silver and gold, but by his own most precious blood.” We should also seek complete victory over every sin; recollecting, that the glory of God as much requires the sanctification of every Christian, as it does the deliverance of his harmless people from those oppressors, who harass them and blaspheme his holy name. And when the Lord's circumstances predicted, which attended his death, burial, resurrection, and glory; and his success in justifying and saving sinners as his spiritual progeny, 8—10. As a recompence of his sufferings, and the fruit of his intercession, he should rescue a numerous people from Satan's bondage, and rule over them as his willing subjects, 11, 12.

promises are performed to us, we obtain an additional assurance that he indeed spake them, and an experimental knowledge of his mercy and truth, and of all his glorious attributes. (Notes, 2 Pet. i. 19. 1 John v. 9, 10. 20, 21.)

V. 7—15.

All blessings come to us sinners, by means of the gospel: we should therefore value and be thankful for that distinguished advantage, above all temporal good. The meanest faithful minister, who brings the joyful tidings of peace and salvation, should be welcomed and respected; his footsteps should be marked and followed, and his doctrine attended to. Ministers should proclaim in the most open manner their joyful message; and endeavour so to walk, as to shew the holy tendency of their doctrine. As those who “watch for men's souls,” they should cry aloud, and be very earnest in circulating the gospel of salvation; and their contented, thankful frame of mind, ever disposed to praise and rejoice in God, should make it plain, that they are happy, and earnestly desire to render their neighbours happy with them. They should also pray continually for a more abundant supply of the Spirit of wisdom and love, that they may all “see eye to eye;” and that unnatural divisions, and acrimonious disputes, may no longer disgrace the gospel of peace. It behoves all of us to pray continually, that many such messengers of salvation may be sent forth, and welcomed by the nations of the earth; that Zion's God, who reigns on “the throne of grace,” may be made known and served by them; that “the waste “places of Jerusalem may rejoice,” and the church be redeemed from thralldom; that so “the LORD may make “bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and that “all the ends of the earth may see the salvation of our “God.” In the mean time, those who are favoured with the gospel are called on to depart from sin, to separate from the world, to renounce every kind of idolatry and superstition, and to “touch no unclean thing;” and those who minister in sacred things should be peculiarly watchful against “all appearance of evil.” These things must not be thought impracticable; for no power, on earth or in hell, can obstruct our escape from the dominion of sin and Satan, if we heartily long and endeavour to return to God and to become his redeemed servants. He will be our Guide and Guard, and our way will be safe, and made plain before us.—Yet we must expect to meet with some of the difficulties, through which our Fore-runner passed to his glory. He dealt prudently, and prospered, and heaven and earth are, and will be, filled with his glory: but who was ever so despised, so abased, insulted, and cruelly entreated as he? (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) Yet having once shed his blood for sinners, its efficacy still continues: may it be sprinkled on our consciences, that we may enjoy inward peace; and may his grace flow into our hearts to make us meet for his glory! (Notes, Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. Tit. ii. 4—7.) May all kings and nations cease from their blasphem

NOTES.

CHAP. LIII. V. 1. 'This chapter declares the circumstances of our Saviour's sufferings so exactly, that it seems rather a history of his passion, than a prophecy. And it is so undeniable a proof of the truth of Christianity, that the bare reading of it, and comparing it with the gospel-history, hath converted some infidels.' Lowth.—The prophet goes on, from mentioning the great success of the gospel among the Gentiles at the close of the preceding chapter, to predict the unbelief of the Jews. (Note, lii. 13—15.) Apostles and evangelists, in the primitive times, may be considered as complaining of this ill success among their countrymen, and wondering at it: or the prophet, as a Jew and speaking in his own name and that of the other prophets, anticipated, with astonishment and sorrow, this conduct of his nation. When John the Baptist, Jesus Christ himself, his apostles, and others, proclaimed the interesting report, that the long expected Messiah was come; though he most exactly answered to the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, and authenticated his mission by most stupendous miracles; yet very few in comparison truly and practically "believed the report," and they were generally of the lowest and most despised persons in the nation. For this "Arm of the LORD," which was employed to redeem his people, was not revealed to them, even when he lived among them: (Note, li. 9—11;) because they were blinded by prejudice; and, for their sins, judicially left destitute of that powerful operation of God's Spirit upon their minds, by which believers were enabled to see the Saviour's glory, "as of the only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." (Notes, John i. 4, 5. 10—14. iii. 19—21. v. 39—47. xii. 37—41. xvi. 8—15. Rom. x. 12—17, v. 16. 2 Cor. iv. 4—6.) V. 2, 3. The wickedness and carnal prejudices of the Jews induced them to reject Christ; but various circumstances proved occasions of it. They expected the Messiah to spring from the avowed and acknowledged heir of King David, and to be openly known as born and educated at Bethlehem; and to come forth in a splendid manner, as a King and a Conqueror. (Notes, Matt. xi. 2—6. Mark vi. 1—4. John vii. 40—53.) But he was the Son of a poor unnoticed virgin, and the reputed Son of a carpenter, who were not generally known to be descended from David: he was brought up at Nazareth, and his birth at Bethlehem had either been unnoticed, or was forgotten; he grew up and lived a long time in obscurity, probably working as a carpenter; he then appeared as a poor man, "who had not where to lay his head," and attended by a few poor fishermen; and he was an itinerant teacher, unauthorized by the priests and scribes. Thus instead "of a Plant of renown," (Note, xi. 1. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31, v. 29,) he grew up before God, in such a manner, that he appeared as a tender shoot, whose root was in a dry ground, where it was never likely to come to any thing. So that, notwithstanding the wisdom and grace of his words, the power of his miracles, and the holy beauty of his character, the Jews could perceive no form or comeliness in him, for which they should desire and welcome him as their Messiah. (Note, Hag. ii. 6—9.) He was therefore generally despised and rejected by them; this contempt and reproach further confirmed the prejudices of the people against him; and every thing concurred in rendering him "a man of sorrows" and intimately "acquainted with grief." The people hid their faces from him, as ashamed to own him; until at length his disciples denied or forsook him, and the Jews, as with one consent, preferred a murderer to him. Or he hid his face, as one covered with confusion, or as concealing his glory from them under this external abasement: so that, in every way, he was deemed undeserving of notice or estimation. (Marg. Ref.)—'From this text, Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and others of the ancient fathers, concluded our Saviour's person to have been deformed, an opinion in my judgment not at all probable: in the fourth and following centuries, a quite contrary notion was advanced, ... that Christ was a person of extraordinary comeliness. (Ps. xlv. 3.) ... From these two contrary opinions, we may conclude, that the making or setting up the image, or the picture of Christ, was no part of religious worship in the early ages of Christianity.' Lowth.

every age and nation, here breaks forth in admiration of the love of Christ, and the mystery of his vicarious sufferings. As every kind of disease and misery springs from sin; so when Christ endured hardship in alleviating these miseries, by healing men's diseases, it might properly be considered as a fulfilment of this prophecy, and a part of his general design. (Note, Matt. viii. 16, 17.) He endured our griefs and sorrows, becoming a sufferer to redeem us from eternal sufferings: and this, which should for ever endear him to mankind, caused the Jews to mistake his character, and to suppose that he was smitten of God, because he was a most atrocious sinner; as Job's friends construed his calamities into a proof of his undetected guilt: and numbers, who have at length become his disciples, were once of the same opinion. He was indeed "wounded," but it was not for his own, but for our, transgressions: he was crushed with most intense agonies of body and soul, but it was "for our iniquities." To make our peace with God, he who was Holy and Beloved consented to bear our punishment, as if it had been a fatherly chastisement; (Note, John xviii. 10—14, v. 11;) and his stripes avail for the pardon, and healing, or sanctification, of our souls. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 18—25, vv. 24, 25.) All the elect people of God are brought to confess, and the whole company of the redeemed in heaven will confess, that they had wandered from God, as sheep from the fold, and must have been devoured by Satan the roaring lion, if the good Shepherd had not come to seek them: every one of them has turned into that devious path, which was congenial to his depraved inclination; but all had added the guilt of rebellion, to the folly of forsaking their only Protector. (Notes, Ps. xxiii. 1—3. cxix. 176. Ez. xxxiv. 11—16. Zech. xiii. 7. Matt. xviii. 12, 13. Luke xv. 1—7.) So that the justice of God must be satisfied, before the criminals could be again received into his favour and under his care: and therefore JEHOVAH laid, or "caused to meet," upon Christ the Surety, not the punishment only, but the iniquity, of them all, imputing it to him, and requiring of him satisfaction for it. (Note, 2 Cor. v. 18—21, v. 21.)—The word (rendered carried), 'signifies properly to have iniquity laid upon one as a burden, which is the same with undergoing the punishment of it.—So it is used Lam. v. 7; "Our fathers have sinned and not, and we have borne their iniquities," that is, we have been punished in their stead. See 11.' Lowth. The modern Jews, to evade the arguments for Christianity deduced from this chapter, explain it, as speaking of Israel, and his oppressions and sufferings: but it is evident on the most cursory reading, that three distinct persons, or companies, are adduced. One the innocent holy sufferer; another the guilty, whose punishment he endured, whose burden of guilt was laid upon him; and the other, the oppressors and despisers of the holy sufferer, by whom he was persecuted, sacrificed, and finally rejected.

8 He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken.

† Heb. the stroke upon him. 1 Pet. iii. 18

V. 7. More literally, "It was exacted, and he answered." Bp. Lowth. Our debt was exacted of our Surety, and he became answerable for it. And therefore, he opened not his mouth to plead for himself, but stood speechless before man's tribunal, that we might have a prevailing plea before that of God. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 63—68. xxvii. 11—18. John xix. 8—12.) He was led, patient, gentle, and innocent, like a lamb to be slaughtered for the food, or sacrificed for the offences, of others; and like a sheep when deprived of its fleece, that others may be clothed with it. (Note, Acts viii. 32—35.)

V. 8. The chief priests and scribes did not cast our Lord into prison, and then after a time give him a fair trial, according to law and custom: but without delay, they delivered him to Pilate, and urged his immediate execution. Thus "he was taken from prison," (being in confinement only a few hours,) "and from judgment; and who shall declare his generation?"—The ancient fathers generally interpreted this of his miraculous conception, or his eternal generation. Who shall declare his descent from David, and his birth at Bethlehem the city of David? Who shall shew, that he was not only the Son of David, but the only begotten Son of God?—But the original word for generation, is seldom, if ever, used in this sense: so that modern interpreters generally dissent from the ancients; and some render it, "His manner of life who shall declare?" None was called, or admitted, to bear witness to his character, as it was customary in criminal causes. But, as the word, rendered "generation," means the time during which an individual, or a number of contemporaries, live; the passage may mean, "Who shall declare, how long his age shall last?" 'Though he died for sin, yet after his resurrection he shall live for ever,' "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore," "Amen: and have the keys of hell, and of death." (Notes, 9, 10. Rev. i. 12—20, v. 18.) Other kings and priests finished their course by death; but he is a King and a High Priest for ever. Yet, who stood forward, previous to his crucifixion, to declare this? For it pleased God that he should "be cut off out of the land of the living," in a violent and illegal manner; because, "for the transgression of his people," "the stroke," or punishment, "was on him."

Robertson.—"His manner of life" "who would declare?" ... גֵּוֹר signifies age, duration, the time which one man or many together pass in this world: in this place, the course, tenour, or manner of life.' Bp. Lowth. If so, it has, 'in this place' a signification, which it bears in no other text of the Hebrew Bible.

V. 9, 10. "A grave was appointed for him with the wicked; but he was with a rich man at his death, because he, &c." As our Lord was crucified between two thieves, it was doubtless intended, that he should be buried with them. Thus "his grave was appointed with the wicked;" but Joseph of Arimathea came and asked for his body, and Pilate readily granted Joseph's request. Thus "he was with a rich man at his death," that is, till his resurrection: and his burial took place, contrary to the intention of his enemies, "because he had done no violence, &c." for otherwise Joseph would scarcely have requested Pilate, and probably Pilate would not have consented, to deliver up the body of a crucified malefactor.—The designed obscurity of the prophecy renders its exact accomplishment the more remarkable.—Some connect the latter clause with what follows, and render it; "Though he had done, &c. "yet it pleased the LORD:" he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth; so that Pilate, when he delivered him to be crucified, declared that he found no fault in him: "yet it pleased the LORD to bruise him." The Father, who was well pleased in him, took pleasure in bruising him with anguish of spirit; because this was for the display of his own glory, and the honour of his law. So that, he not only permitted his enemies cruelly to insult and torment him; but he put him to grief by his own hand, and made "his soul exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death." Thus "his soul," or life, was "made an offering for sin:" not only was his blood shed, as that of the sacrifices used to be; but he endured the feeling of the wrath of God due to our sins, which the fire from heaven, consuming on the altar the inwards or bodies of the sacrifices, typified. In consequence of this, it was foretold, that he would see a numerous spiritual offspring, the fruit of all his toil and pain: (Notes, viii. 18. lix. 20, 21. Ps. xxii. 30, 31. Heb. ii. 10—15. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10;) for he would rise again from the dead, and "then prolong his days;" and "the pleasure of the LORD," in converting and saving sinners, would prosper in his powerful and gracious hands.—This is a prediction of his resurrection and subsequent glory, equally clear with that of his sufferings. (Note, John xii. 23—26, v. 24.)—The interpretation of the clause, "It pleased the LORD to bruise him," as given by many expositors, has been objected to; because the Septuagint does not use the same word in translating this passage, with which the Evangelist records the voice from heaven, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." But when it is duly considered, that the Hebrew word is frequently used for the highest kind and degree of satisfaction; the objection must vanish. (Gen. xxxiv. 19. Num. xiv. 8. Mic. vii. 18. Heb.—Notes, xlii. 21. lxii. 1—5.)—[†] נִפְתָּח notes the highest content that may be, to wit, delight; ... it is the same with עֲדֹנָיִם. Leigh. The noun, directly formed from it, is used in the concluding words, "The pleasure of the LORD, &c." (Eph. i. 5. 9. 2 Thes. i. 11. Luke xii. 32. Gr.)

In his death. (9) "Was his tomb." Bp. Lowth.—The original word may be formed from another root, and mean an elevated place, as sepulchres generally were in those ages and places. The variation does not at all alter the meaning.

V. 11, 12. JEHOVAH here declares that the Messiah should see such abundant effect of his agonies and death, "the travail of his soul," that he would be fully satisfied and rejoice in it. His gospel would make known his person, love, righteousness, atonement, and salvation: and thus "by the knowledge of him, he would justify many;" (Notes, John xvii. 1—3. Phil. iii. 8—11;) "having borne their sins in his own body on the tree." "Because he had poured out his soul unto death," and, though perfectly righteous, had submitted to be "numbered with transgressors," or malefactors, and to "bear the sins of many," that he might become their Intercessor; therefore the Father would surely grant unto him an immense multitude of sinners to be saved and ruled by him, who before were the slaves of Satan, and must have continued to belong to that potent enemy of God and man; and he should have "all power in heaven and earth," to enable him to rescue all who had been given to him, and to complete their salvation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlix. 7, 8. 24—26. John vi. 36—40. Eph. i. 15—23. Col. ii. 13—15. Rev. vii. 9—12.)—This prophecy, delivered at least seven hundred years before the birth of Christ, and coinciding so exactly with the history of his sufferings and death; the design and object of them, as recorded and assigned in the New Testament; and the effect of them, as it has been evidently produced for almost eighteen hundred years, constitutes a most unanswerable demonstration not only of the truth of the scriptures, but also of the great doctrines of the gospel. Nor is this in the least in-

CHAP. LIV.

Predictions that the church shall be exceedingly enlarged by the conversion of the Gentiles: with pro-validated by the infidelity of the Jews, who, deeming this to be the word of God by Isaiah, can see nothing of Jesus in it; but adopt the grossest absurdities imaginable, in order to make out some other interpretations: for "the veil is upon their hearts; but when they shall be turned to the Lord, it shall be taken away." (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 12—16.) Indeed their unbelief also is most expressly predicted, at the opening of the chapter; so that it may "turn to us for a testimony."—It has lately been publicly declared by a Jew who professed and preached Christianity, that the Rabbies forbid the people to read this chapter, with dreadful denunciations; and the assertion has not been publicly and explicitly contradicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

Whilst every vague, unimportant, and improbable report is greedily drunk in by the absurd credulity of mankind; the most interesting and completely authenticated report of salvation for sinners, through the incarnate Son of God, is almost universally rejected or disregarded! We have to this day lamentable cause to complain, and to wonder, that so few believe it: and we may profitably enquire, who they are that do so. Not many of the noble, the wealthy, the learned of the world; not all, who are called by the name of Christ, and profess his religion; not the covetous, the sensual, the dissipated, the proud and ambitious, the cruel and oppressive: but a small company, who are "poor in spirit," mourning for sin, renouncing the world, devoted to God, following after holiness, meek, peaceable, forgiving, inoffensive, and benevolent; yet despised, and reviled as their Saviour was. To them, "Christ, the Power of God and the Wisdom of God," has been made known; his Spirit has enlightened their minds, and humbled and changed their hearts; and thus they have seen his glory, and supremely value his salvation. To others the whole appears contemptible; "the preaching of his cross is foolishness;" and a life of obedience to his precepts is madness or preciseness, a want of taste and spirit, the result of bigotry and fanaticism, and a certain indication of a weak understanding and a narrow mind! They "see no form or comeliness" in the character of Christ; as delineated in scripture, and exemplified by his true disciples; nor is there "any excellency in him, that they should desire him" and seek after him. He is still despised in his people, and rejected of men as to his doctrine and authority: and in very many companies of professed Christians, even in the most respectable circles, an open declaration of our faith in Christ, and love to his name and cause, would excite disgust and scorn. We may indeed well endure our lighter sufferings; if he have taught us to esteem all things but loss for him, and "to love him who hath so loved us." He willingly bare our griefs when we were enemies, and shall we repine at bearing our cross for the sake of such a generous Friend? Should we be treated as the vilest of mankind, and counted the peculiar objects of the divine abhorrence; let us re-mises of great honour and happiness to her, as espoused by God, 1—5. Encouraging assurances of deliverance from affliction, perpetual mercy, prosperity, and victory over every enemy, to the church, and to every servant of God, 6—17.

member him, who "endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be weary and faint in our minds." (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) Let us often retire, in contemplation, to Gethsemane and Golgotha: and, whilst we survey the sufferings of the Son of God, let us review our long catalogue of former and later transgressions, and consider him as scourged, wounded, bruised, insulted, and crucified; as agonizing, bleeding, and dying, under the load of our guilt. Thus we shall learn to hate and to mortify sin: we shall understand our obligations to our gracious Friend, and be constrained by love to live to his glory. (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 13—15. Gal. vi. 11—14, v. 14.) In this we are all concerned; for we have all gone astray from God, though in different ways; and we must all have perished, had not the good Shepherd come to seek and save us; and willingly borne the load of our iniquity, which would have been far too heavy for us to bear, and under which we must have sunk for ever, as all unbelievers most certainly will. Our debt was "exacted of him," and he paid "the uttermost farthing;" and in doing this, "he was led as a lamb to the slaughter:" and shall we, who deserve the final wrath of God, be impatient, "like a wild bull in a net," under our light afflictions? Let us then prove, that we rely on his atonement alone, by copying his example of meekness and submission; however we may be chastised of God, or oppressed and despised by men.

V. 8—12.

We may comfortably leave all the circumstances of our death to the merciful Saviour: he has sanctified every way of dying and every place of sepulture, whether we make our grave with the wicked, or be with the rich and honourable in our death. However we may suffer with evil-doers; yet if we "do no violence and speak no guile," nothing can hurt us. (Notes, 1 Pet. iii. 13—18. iv. 12—16.) If it should please the Lord to prove our faith and patience, by grievous and complicated distresses, or to cut us off by sudden or violent death: the Redeemer's atoning sufferings will secure a happy event to us, and to all those who bear his image and partake of his Spirit. Being now risen from the dead, and ever living to carry on his work and plead our cause; "the pleasure of the Father prospereth in his hand." Here is laid the firm foundation, on which the trembling sinner may rest his soul; for he beholds the true penitent, who humbly ventures nigh, to seek the benefit of his atoning blood by faith in his name, with that affection and complacency, with which the tender mother eyes her new-born infant, the fruit and recompence of all her anguish; he then "sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied." These are the trophies of his victory, the purchase of his blood, the monuments of his grace: for this he "poured out his soul unto death," and "was numbered with transgressors;" for this he continually intercedes and prevails; thus he destroys the works of the devil, and rescues the prey from the hands of that mighty one. Let us bless the Lord for the knowledge of Christ, by which numbers in every age are justified: let us pray and endeavour, that it may be extended to all our fellow sinners: and let us think no labour, hardship, or expense too great, by which we may promote that cause, for which the Redeemer shed his blood. Thus we shall prove ourselves partakers of his salvation, and make an acceptable return of gratitude for his unspeakable love.

NOTES.

CHAP. LIV. V. 1. 'In the foregoing chapter the prophet described the sufferings of Christ, and here he prophesies the increase and glory of the church, which should follow; ... which indeed were to commence from the time of Christ's passion, but would not be completed till ... after the Jews were again restored to God's favour.' Lowth. The connexion and language of the chapter necessarily lead our thoughts to the times of the gospel, with very little reference to previous deliverances. The church of Israel is here represented as a married woman, who, like Sarah, had long continued barren. Comparatively few real believers, the children of God and of the church, had been raised up in the nation. And about the time when Messiah should come, Pharisaical formality, Sadducean infidelity, and open impiety, would become almost universal. This was a subject of grief to the small remnant of believers: but the coming of Christ, and his sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension, would introduce better times. Though the nation in general rejected him, and were cast off; yet numerous children were born unto the church: the Gentile converts were adopted into her family; and those nations which had been destitute of ordinances, and "strangers to the covenants of promise," produced a far larger increase of true believers, than the nation of Israel, which had been married to the Lord, by their national covenant and distinguished advantages had ever done. As these were all the true children of the church, she was called on to break forth into loud songs of joyful praise; notwithstanding the unbelief and rejection of that nation, of which her family had hitherto chiefly consisted. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlix. 18—21. lx. 4—7. Gal. iv. 21—31, v. 27.)

V. 2, 3. The church is still addressed as a matron, who with her small family resided in a tent: but this tent would soon be found incapable of containing all her children.

She must therefore prepare to occupy more room, and make much larger curtains and longer cords: and, as perpetuity, as well as enlargement, was to distinguish the Christian dispensation, she must also "strengthen the stakes," on which the curtains were suspended. (Note, xlix. 18—21.) And she need not fear making too large preparations: for immense accessions might be expected: and her family would be so increased, that it would spread abroad on every side, and at length occupy the countries and cities, which had been the most given up to idolatry, and strangers to the name and worship of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Zech. viii. 20—23. Mal. i. 9—11, v. 11.)

V. 4, 5. The church, (or nation of Israel,) in her youth, had been basely enslaved in Egypt; and afterwards she had been greatly defiled by idolatries and debased by grievous oppressions. She also lay under the reproach of barrenness, and had been put away, as if rejected for unfaithfulness: but, by the introduction of the gospel-dispensation, and by that purity and prosperity which were intended and foretold, these reproaches would all be wiped off and forgotten; and she need no more fear being put to shame and confounded, by the reproach of being left forlorn and destitute as a widow. (Notes, 6—10, v. 6. Lam. i. 1, 2.) For "the LORD of Hosts," the Creator of the world, and of the church, would avow his relation to her as her Husband; and afford her all the protection, and shew her all the kindness, which that endeared relation implies. He had all along been spoken of as "the Redeemer and the Holy One of Israel;" but he would at length be acknowledged and worshipped, as "the God of the whole earth."—Christ is the Redeemer and the Bridegroom of the church; and he is her Creator, and "the God of the whole earth." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Zech. ix. 9, 10. xiv. 6—9, v. 9. Rom. iii. 29—31.)

V. 6—10. The church of Israel had been in the condition of a woman forsaken by her husband and "grieved in spirit;" having been espoused in her youth, and afterwards rejected with dislike for her misconduct: but the Lord was about to recall her into a state of more comfortable and intimate communion with him. (Notes, Hos. iii.)—The abominable idolatries and atrocious iniquities of Israel and Judah, the low estate of religion among them, and the repeated triumphs of their enemies, as if God had quite cast them off, and the grief that these things occasioned to believers, are here intended: probably with reference to the calamities and oppression of the Christian church, during the prevalence of antichristian corruptions and oppressions, and the state of the nation of Israel unto this day. But this frown and hiding of God's countenance, and the consequent affliction of the church would be momentary, compared with the duration of her peace and prosperity: his little wrath, or wrath of very short continuance, would soon be pacified; and he would gather her and her increasing multitude of children, with everlasting kindness and abundant mercies. (Note, Ps. xxx. 5.) His engagements to this effect were as irrevocable, as the covenant made with Noah, and confirmed with an oath, that he would never more drown the world; (Note, Gen. ix. 9—17;) for he had also sworn by himself never to rebuke and be wroth with his church, as in times past, or so as to cast her off: for his covenant of peace, the result of his tender mercies, would be more durable than the mountains, and abide in full force, and in its glorious and happy effects, when they shall remove and be seen no more.—This may also relate to the calling of Abraham, and the covenant made with him and his posterity. (Notes, xi. 11—16. xii. lvi. 8. lx. 1—3. Gen. xlix. 10. Jer. xxxiii. 17—26. Mic. vii. 18—20. Mal. ii. 13—16. Rom. xi. 22—32. Rev. xx. 11—15.)

V. 11—14. The church is here again considered, as a woman in great distress; as a person at sea in a storm, and in danger of being ship-wrecked; or as dwelling in a tent, which was ready to be overturned by a furious tempest; and in short, as bereft of every comfort. All the persecutions and calamities of the church, as well as the temptations, afflictions, and discouragements of believers, seem to be intended.—But she is assured, that all these will end in great felicity and honour. Instead of her mean, uncomfortable tent, the Lord promises to build her a most glorious city or palace, whose foundations, windows, walls, and towers, should be formed of precious stones, most beautiful and durable. These are emblems of the light, purity, and prosperity, which the church on earth shall at length enjoy, resembling those of heaven. (Notes, Rev. xxi. 9—27.) 'These seem to be general images to express beauty, magnificence, purity, strength, and solidity, agreeably to the ideas of the eastern nations; and to have never been intended to be strictly scrutinized, or minutely and particularly explained, as if each of them had some precise moral or spiritual meaning.' Bp. Lowth.—Numbers of the children of the church had in past ages been uninstructed, or ill-instructed; but it is promised, that all her "children shall be taught of the LORD," by his Spirit, and according to his word. (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 31—34. John vi. 41—46, v. 45. 60—65, v. 65. 1 John ii. 20—25, v. 20. 26—29, v. 27.) This may be understood of the true Israel, as distinguished from Israel according to the flesh: yet it seems to relate especially to those glorious times, which are to succeed the tribulations of the church. Then her children will have great peace, both outward and inward: she shall be established in righteousness, and delivered from oppression, and even from the fear of it. (Notes, lx. 15—22. lxvi. 10—14. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31. xxxvii. 15—22. xxxix. 23—29. Rev. xx. 1—6.)

V. 15—17. This may be considered as a general promise to the church, through successive ages. Many assailants would combine against her; but, the Lord being on her side, they would without exception, "fall for her sake." The Redeemer of the church is the Creator even of those who forge weapons of war, yea of the great destroyers of mankind, and persecutors of his people; both are in his hands, and employed or restrained at his pleasure: and he engages to take care, that no weapons formed final victory were to be considered, as the heritage of each

 as to numerous individuals: but it cannot possibly answer to the general language of the passage. (Notes, Ez.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—5.

All, who love God and man, will rejoice and be thankful, when sinners are converted; for then the prayers of the church are answered, and the sufferings of Christ are made effectual, to his glory in the salvation of souls.
 (Notes and P. O. Luke xv. 1—10.)—Frequently, those places and congregations, where means and appearances of religion most abound, are wretchedly destitute of the life and power of it; the Lord has often many more children in places comparatively desolate; and the gospel is commonly most successful where it has newly been sent.—When sinners repent and believe, they are numbered among the children of God and of the church; and should be received by us as brethren, even though they belong not to our party.—Though very great multitudes have accepted of the invitations of the gospel, there is yet room for immensely more in the kingdom of Christ: and we should expect large accessions to the church under the Christian dispensation; and be instant in prayer, that her seed may inherit the nations, and replenish all the dark and desolate places of the earth. Much has already been done, in fulfilling these predictions, for which we should praise the Lord: but we are still called on to enlarge the place of Zion’s tabernacle, to “stretch forth her curtains,” and, with vast expectations, to “lengthen her cords and “strengthen her stakes;” assured that she shall yet “break “forth on the right hand and on the left,” till the earth be filled with truth and righteousness.—Ministers, rulers, merchants, wealthy persons, and every description of men, will find very much to do in this important concern, if they improve their talents and watch for opportunities: and we need not fear, but that God will accept our prayers and second our endeavours, when they are regulated by his precepts and promises. The believer also should endeavour to rise superior to those fears, which originate from reflecting on his evil nature, or from reviewing “the shame “of his youth,” or those former instances of unfaithfulness, of which he now humbly repents. The Lord will blot out his transgressions, and wipe away his reproach, and he will never forsake those who trust in his mercy:

 nay, he will receive them into the most honourable and happy relation to himself; “their Maker the LORD of “Hosts, the God of the whole earth,” will become their Husband and Redeemer. (Notes, John iii. 27—36, v. 29.
 2 Cor. xi. 1—6, v. 2. Eph. v. 22—27. Rev. xix. 7, 8.) We never can sufficiently admire this condescension, or estimate this privilege: we cannot expect too much from his love, confide too entirely in his protection, glory too much in this honour, or take too much delight in communion with this our loving Friend. To form this union and to encourage our confidence, he dwells in human nature, and is called Immanuel: he shed his blood for our ransom, and endows us with all his unsearchable riches; he will cleanse us from all our sins, adorn us with suitable decorations, and shortly take us to himself, to rejoice for ever with him in this sacred union. Let us then walk in simplicity of heart with him, centring all our affections on him, and expecting all our happiness from him alone.

V. 6—17.

Even real Christians often give cause of jealousy to their gracious Lord; and then he frowns, hides his face, and seems as if he would reject them according to their deservings. Then they fear being forsaken, and are “grieved in “spirit:” but when duly humbled they seek his face, he recalls them into his presence, and renews the tokens of his love. And to all, who really love and trust in him, his absence and frown are momentary; but his mercies and kindness are infinite and everlasting. He has promised never to leave nor forsake his people; he has formed that promise into a covenant of peace, and has ratified and sealed it; and he has confirmed it with an oath for our more complete satisfaction. He will indeed correct and rebuke his people; but he will not cast them off, any more than he will again drown the world for the sins of men: and the experience of more than four thousand years evinces, that their crimes cannot provoke him to violate that irrevocable engagement. Let this encourage us to “give diligence to make our calling and election sure;” that when we are afflicted and tempted, we may know, and be comforted by, our interest in these promises; and be assured, that our “light and momentary afflictions are “working for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight “of glory.”—But let us not forget, that all the genuine children of the church, are “taught of the LORD;” they desire, seek, and depend on that teaching; and they are taught by him to hate sin, to believe in Christ, and obey him; and thus they find rest and great peace to their souls. The more assured they are, that “their labour will “not be in vain in the Lord,” the more “stedfast and immoveable” they are in his work.—Those who are thus taught of God, need fear no enemy; except so as to watch, and pray against temptation. Many may attempt to injure them, but God is their Protector; many may reproach them, but God is their Justifier. They are his servants and his children; and he is not only their Lord and their Father, but their Husband; and who can rise up against them with impunity? Let us then seek that “righteousness of God, which is unto all and upon all that believe;” (Note, Rom. iii. 21—26;) let us beseech him to sanctify our souls, and employ us in his service: and thus we may disregard both the wasters who destroy the nations, and the weapons that are formed against the church; and enjoy the present privileges, and expect the future heritage, of the redeemed servants of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. LV. V. 1—3. The sufferings and subsequent glorious exaltation and glory of the Redeemer, and the security and happiness of his church, having been fully declared; (Notes, liii. liv;) here follows an invitation to the sons of men to come and share the invaluable blessings. The prophet seems to personate the first preachers of the gospel, when they went forth in the name of the Lord to “compel” men to come in to the marriage-supper, even from the highways and hedges: but Christ himself then spake, and still speaks, the same things by his word and ministers. (Notes, xii. Prov. i. 20—23. viii. 1—4. 31—34. ix. 1—6. Matt. xi. 28—30. John iv. 10—15. vii. 37—39. Rev. xxi. 5—8, v. 6. xxii. 16, 17.)—The blessings before mentioned were “the heritage of the servants of the LORD:” (liv. 17:) but here men in general are called on, by proclamation, to approach and partake of them, as men come to the waters to draw for themselves. All who thirst for pardon, grace, and salvation, are invited to come to God through Christ for them; nay, all who thirst for happiness are exhorted to seek it from Him. The blessings which he bestows are abundant like the waters; but they are precious, pleasant, and exhilarating, as wine and milk, or the most nutrimental and delicious food; (Note, xxv. 6—8;) and though freely bestowed, “without money or price,” to accommodate those who desire them, but are conscious that they have not wherewith to purchase them; yet they are too valuable to be bought with money: at the same time they cannot be secured, except by parting with whatever comes in competition with them. (Notes, Prov. xxiii. 23. Matt. xiii. 44—46. Phil. iii. 8—11. Rev. iii. 17—20.)—The Lord then expostulates with the sons of men, who waste their lives, mis-employ their powers, and weary themselves for such things as are “not bread and cannot satisfy;” who bestow immense pains, and sacrifice every valuable consideration, for the sake of such acquisitions, as can neither add to their present comfort, nor prolong their lives, nor save their souls. (Notes, xxviii. 20. xlv. 19, 20.) This equally applies to the votaries of this vain and vexatious world; and to those who devise and are very earnest about false and worthless schemes of religion. If nothing better could be had, such men might have some shew of reason for their conduct: but as the Lord invites them to come, and partake of substantial good and satisfying happiness, in his favour and service; they are most unreasonable, as well as criminal, in their worldly courses and neglect of the gospel. They are therefore exhorted diligently to hearken to the Lord, to attend to his doctrine, and embrace his salvation: and thus the everlasting covenant of grace will be ratified with them; and all the mercies promised to David, and to his Seed and Antitype the Messiah, ensured to their souls. (*Notes, lxi. 7—9. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Ps. lxxxix. 19—37. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. xxxii. 39—41. xxxiii. 17—26. Ez. xxxvii. 24, 25. Acts xiii. 24—37, v. 34. mised Saviour ; whom he had " given as a Witness to the " people," the " faithful and true Witness ; (Notes, xliii. " 8-13, v. 10. Rev. iii. 14-16, v. 14 ;) the Light of the " Gentiles, as well as of his people Israel : " for the words are plural in the original : " Peoples ; " Bp. Lowth. The Messiah was the grand blessing intended by " the sure mercies of Da- " vid." He had appointed him to publish his will, attest his truths, and ratify his covenant ; he was given to be a Leader and Forerunner of his people, to guide men into the ways of peace and holiness, and to lead them to victory and liberty ; and to be their Commander, their Captain, Lawgiver, Judge, Ruler, and Protector. (Notes, Dan. ix. 25-27. Heb. ii. 10-13. Rev. i. 4-6.)—JEHOVAH then addressed the Messiah himself. The nation of Israel would generally refuse to have him for their Witness, Leader, and Commander : but at the call of his gospel " a holy nation " would be formed under his government, who had not before been known by him as the worshippers of God : yea, many nations, which had been strangers to him, would hasten to him and become his subjects : as ardently desiring the favour of the Lord God of Israel ; who had raised him from the dead, exalted him to his right hand in heaven, and sent forth his Holy Spirit with his apostles, to give success to the gospel ; and thus had glorified him, whom man despised. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlii. 5-7. xlix. 5, 6. lii. 13-15, v. 13. liii. 9-12. John xii. 23-26, v. 23. 27-33, v. 28. xvii. 1-3, v. 1. Acts iii. 12-16.) V. 6, 7. Whilst the gospel was preached to the Jews, God was near to them, and might be found by them : but he was about to withdraw, and then they would be left to judicial blindness. (Notes, Luke xliii. 22-30. xix. 41-44. John xii. 34-36. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. iii. 7-13.) The exhortation however is equally given to others.—" God is " in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." Jesus is " Immanuel, God with us ; " " God manifested in the flesh." Through him the Lord may be found on a throne of grace, and in his holy ordinances : he is near those who hear his gospel, and he often strives with their hearts by his Holy Spirit : but the means of grace may be withdrawn, or that influence which gives efficacy to them withheld ; and life must soon terminate : and then God will no more be found by any wicked man, or be graciously near to him. Let then all who hear, seize the opportunity, and seek the knowledge and favour of God without delay, by faith and prayer. All who are not righteous, according to the tenour of the gospel, are wicked, and need this conversion and salvation ; and the most criminal and unrighteous may yet obtain forgiveness : but then they must repent, and forsake all sins, especially those to which they have been most habituated, " every ore to his own way." (liii. 6.) They must also forsake their evil imaginations, desires, counsels, and devices ; and no longer expect happiness in wickedness, or salvation from themselves, or in their sins : they must " return to the " LORD," by ceasing to rebel against him, and becoming his loyal subjects ; and thus, they may be assured, he will have mercy on them, and multiply pardons to them, even as they have multiplied sins against him : nay, continuing to pardon their daily trespasses, as long as they live on earth ; they still persevering in the same course of humble repentance and believing prayer. V. 8, 9. The thoughts and ways of the Lord, in his dealings with sinners, are wholly different from those of men, and often contrary to them : and they are as far above them, as the heavens are above the earth. (Notes, Ps. xxv. 10. ciii. 11-13.) His wisdom and love, in giving his only begotten Son to be the sacrifice for the sins of men when rebels and enemies, and thus glorifying his justice, holiness, and law, even in shewing mercy to the most atrocious criminals ; his method of justifying the ungodly by faith in the righteousness of Christ, and of sanctifying the unholy by his new-creating Spirit ; his way of teaching men to live sober, righteous, and godly lives, by the preaching of that free salvation, which the wise men of the world suppose to tend to licentiousness ; his plan of hiding these things from the wise and prudent, and revealing them to babes ; his constant readiness to pardon and save all who come, to supply all their wants, to enrich them with all blessings, and fill them with " peace and joy " in believing," notwithstanding former provocations ; his rule of not " calling the righteous, but sinners to repent- " ance ; " and formerly, his calling of the Gentiles and rejection of the Jews : these things, and numberless others, shew the thoughts and ways of God to be widely different from the ways of man, and infinitely more excellent. (Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 19. Matt. ix. 10-13. xi. 25, 26. xxi. 28-32. Rom. iv. 4, 5. v. 10. 1 Cor. ii. 6-9. Eph. iii. 9-12, v. 10. 1 Tim. i. 12-16. Men are apt to think the unworthiness of the object a bar to their kindness ; and to reject those who are beneath them, or have been provoking to them, or who have been often before relieved, or have brought their troubles on themselves, or are likely to be further burdensome. They despair of many descriptions of sinners, and excuse their neglect of them, by the pretence that they are wholly incorrigible. It is well that the Lord does not deal with them by such rules ; but that his ways and thoughts are infinitely superior to all these limitations. (Notes, Rom. v. 20, 21. Eph. i. 3—8.)

V. 10, 11. The Lord sends the rain and snow to water the earth, and to make the seed sown in it to vegetate; and thus to produce food for man, and seed to sow again for a future crop: (Note, 2 Cor. ix. 8—11:) and he does not withhold or re-call his bounty, because many abuse it; nor can their perverseness prevent this appointment of the weather, and course of the seasons. Thus the unbelief and opposition of the Jews, or any others, should not prevent the success of the gospel: God would perform his promises and purposes: he would accompany the gospel with the Holy Spirit, and cause the seed to take root and grow, and produce its effects, in the conversion of sinners, and preparing for the benefit of future ages. In short, his “word should not return void, but accomplish” his great designs, in defiance of all opposition. (Notes, xlv. 10, 11. 2 Thes. i. 11, 12.)

That which I please. (11)—^{וְהָיָה}. “That in which I delight.” Not merely accomplishing the purpose of God, but “the good pleasure of his will” in the conversion of the nations: for “he delighteth in mercy.” (Notes, liii. 9, 10. Eph. i. 5—8. 9—12, vv. 9, 11. iii. 9—12, vv. 10, 11.)

V. 12, 13. Here may be some distant allusion to the return of the Jews from Babylon: but far greater events are evidently intended. The poor prisoners of Satan, set at liberty from their noisome dungeon, through the Redeemer’s grace, by means of the gospel preached to them, would go out with joy, and be led forth with peace in the way to heaven. (Note, xlix. 9—13.) Joyful praises would on that account resound on every side: as if the mountains, hills, and forests were animated, to unite with saints and angels in heaven, and saints on earth, in exulting thanksgivings. (Notes, xlii. 10—12. Ps. xvi. 10—13. xcviii. 7—9.) When the grossest idolaters, and the most wicked and mischievous of sinners, became true Christians, holy persons, worshippers of God, and useful to mankind; then the stately and useful fir-tree came in the place of the worthless thorn; and the beautiful, fragrant myrtle, in that of the entangling brier, or stinging nettle. These blessed effects of the gospel are highly honourable to the name of God: and the continuance of Christianity on earth to the end of time, and the happiness of the believer in heaven for ever, form an everlasting monument or trophy of his power and love: the continuance also of this work of new creating grace, through successive generations, even to the end of the world; has been, is, and will be, an everlasting sign, a supernatural evidence, that the gospel is “the power of God unto salvation,” “never to be cut off,” even when miracles finally ceased in the church. (Notes, xi. 6—9. xxxv. 8—10. Jer. xlii. 8—11. xxxiii. 6—9. Luke ii. 8—14, v. 14. 2 Thes. i. 5—10.)—The conversion of the Gentiles is evidently predicted by these emblems; and likewise the restoration of the dispersed Jews and Israelites.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—5.

All are welcome to the blessings of salvation, to whom those blessings are welcome. Sinners should therefore be loudly and earnestly invited to come to Christ, and exhorted to use diligently and perseveringly the means of grace: that those who thirst for these waters of life, but fear lest they should be excluded because of their aggravated and numerous crimes, may be encouraged; and that the proud, the sensual, and scornful may be left without excuse.—We cannot too highly recommend the rich provisions made for our perishing souls: it is our interest on any terms to make them our own. But where shall we, whose best services merit condemnation, find “money or price” with which to purchase such invaluable blessings? Sin and misery are all we can call our own: our bodies and souls always were the Lord’s just due, and every service which we can possibly perform. We already owe an immense debt, and cannot pay one farthing; our inheritance is forfeited, and we have merited condemnation: our wants are innumerable, and we have nothing with which to supply them. (P. O. Luke vii. 36—50.) But the Lord Jesus has purchased for us every blessing; he freely bestows on every believer whatever can conduce to his present comfort or everlasting felicity; and on all those, who come to ask them, with the additional favour that he would take them as his servants, and make them what he would have them to be. But though none, except those who hunger and thirst for spiritual blessings, will thus “come, buy, and eat, without money and without price:” (Note, Matt. v. 6:) yet all should be invited; because God in this way generally first excites such desires in the hearts of men. All seek to be happy; (Note, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2;) yet most men “spend money for that which is not bread, and labour for that which satisfieth not:” with such we may expostulate; and, while we shew them the folly of their present conduct, we may exhort them diligently to hearken to the Saviour’s voice; we may persuade them to read and meditate on his sacred word, and to seek the teaching of his Holy Spirit; to observe his directions, to accede to his invitations, and to make trial of his easy yoke. (Note, Matt. xi. 28—30.) Then, and not before, they will “find rest to their souls;” thus, and in no other way, they “will eat that which is good, and their souls will delight themselves in fatness.” Inclining our ears to his instructions, and coming to him for salvation, we obtain life and the blessings of “the everlasting covenant,” through the blood of its great and gracious Surety: he then becomes our Teacher, Leader, and Ruler; by him we have access to the Father and fellowship with him; and through him our services are accepted, and our happiness secured. He calls those, who hitherto have been strangers, nay, enemies: through grace they obey his call, and run to him to share the privileges of his redeemed people; and in their conversion and holy conversation he is glorified, and the Father is glorified in him: and the calling of the gentiles into the church, has brought us, in this distant island and period of time, to experience those invaluable blessings. May they be communicated to all the nations of the earth, and may Britons be prospered abundantly, in all their efforts for this purpose, with all, in every land, who concur in the glorious design.

V. 6—13.

While the word of God proposes to us eternal salvation “the LORD is near us, and may be found;” let all therefore who read or hear of this salvation, seek him and call upon him without delay: and let none trifle with his plenteous mercy, or pervert it into an encouragement to sin; but let the wicked call on him to help them, that in his strength they may forsake their ungodly ways, and exclude their polluting thoughts and desires; and let them “return to the LORD” by penitent faith and prayer, that they may obtain an interest in his abundant mercy, and multiplied pardons. And let none of us limit him by our rules, as if there were any sinners too hardened to be converted, or too criminal to be forgiven; or as if any of them might properly be left without refuge and hope. Let the discouraged penitent remember, that “where sin hath abounded, grace much more abounds;” and let ministers and Christians observe, that “the things which are impossible with man, are possible with God.” We should therefore use every means to reclaim the most desperate offenders, and to do good to those who are most distant from us, or have been most injurious to us: for the Lord's thoughts and ways are not as ours, but immensely above them, and more excellent than they.—Assuredly the word of God, when faithfully preached, will answer the ends which he has purposed, and will always in some instances be blessed to bring sinners to repentance; and who can describe the happy change, which then takes place in their state and character? Delivered from the wrath to come, and from the bondage of sin and Satan; justified by faith and reconciled unto God, the converted sinner begins to experience sweet peace in his conscience; hope animates and gratitude enlarges his heart, and love constrains him to devote himself to the service of his merciful Redeemer. Instead of a profane, contentious, selfish, or sensual wretch, the grief or temptation of all around him; behold him now patient, meek, humble, blameless, upright, benevolent, and peaceable; a kind relation, a faithful friend, a compassionate neighbour, a spiritual worshipper, a follower of Christ, an example to others, a useful member of society, and an instrument of God, to diffuse the knowledge of his salvation around him, and to transmit it to the next generation, and thus to glorify his name! In such converts, indeed, the Lord will be everlastingly glorified, and many will be unspeakably benefited by them. Well then may there be joy in heaven and in earth, when one sinner thus repents. (Notes and P. O. Luke xv.) How should the hopes of being instrumental in so good a work, animate our endeavours to spread the gospel of salvation; and our prayers, that such trophies of the Redeemer's victories may every where be multiplied! And, how should we endeavour to be living demonstrations, that this is the genuine tendency of the gospel; and to “let our light so shine before men, that they may see our good works, and glorify our heavenly Father!”

NOTES.

CHAP. LVI. V. 1, 2. The prophet doubtless was guided to write his predictions, in that way which might render them useful to the Jews in his own time, as well as in after ages, and to the church to the end of the world. We may therefore consider this as an exhortation to the Jews under any of their calamities, or when captive at Babylon, to wait and prepare for deliverance, by attending to the precepts and ordinances of God. As, however, it here stands, it seems to be equivalent to the call of John the Baptist: “Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” (Note, Matt. iii. 2.) The attention of the Jews, about the time of Christ, was taken up, almost exclusively, with trivial observances, to the neglect of “the weightier matters of the law:” and their formality, hypocrisy, iniquity, and presumptuous confidence in external privileges, led them to reject his salvation, of which they neither perceived the necessity, nor understood the nature. The sermon of Christ on the mount, and the general tenour of his preaching were very similar to this address; and, by shewing the spiritual nature of true religion, both tended to discover to them their need of mercy and grace, and to lead them to follow after holiness.—The Lord here assures the Jews, that his salvation approached, his promises were about to be fulfilled, and his righteousness revealed, by their expected Messiah. But as these were spiritual blessings, they would not be welcome to the carnal heart: and therefore it behoved them to prepare for the reception of them, by repentance, attention to justice and equity, and attendance on his ordinances. For, though such as trust in their supposed good works are far from the kingdom of heaven; yet all who believe the scriptures, and wait for salvation according to the promises of God, "repent, and do works meet for repentance;" they do justice, and are conscientious in their various duties. And happy is he, "who does this," laying hold of it as a man in earnest, keeping holy the Sabbath-day, and withholding his hand from doing any evil: for such are "not far from the kingdom of God;" and the Lord will shew them his salvation, seeing he has taught them thus to wait for it. (Notes, lviii. 13, 14. Ps. xxiv. 3—6. cvi. 3—5. cxix. 1—5. 155. 166. Mark xii. 28—34. Rom. vii. 22—25. Rev. xxii. 14, 15.)—To be revealed. (1) Note, Rom. i. 17.

V. 3—7. Strangers and eunuchs lay under several disadvantages, according to the Mosaick dispensation: (Notes, Deut. xxiii. 1—8:) and it was deemed a peculiar misfortune, and even disgrace, among the Jews, to be childless. (Note, iv. 1.) But the gospel abolishes all these distinctions: and such declarations as this implied, that the shadows of the old dispensation were about to vanish, and that a brighter day was dawning. The Gentile could not in any case be admitted to the full privilege of an Israelite, without circumcision, and an exact observance of the ritual law; and in some cases, he would after all lie under several disqualifications. But, without at all mentioning these particulars, the Lord assured strangers, who came to "join themselves to him, to love his name and be his servants," to "hallow his sabbath, and take hold of his covenant" of grace and mercy; (Note, lv. 1—3;) that he would introduce them as spiritual worshippers on his holy mountain, make them joyful in his courts, and accept their sacrifices equally with those of the Jews: for he purposed that his temple should "be called an house of prayer for all people," or "all the peoples." (Note, Matt. xxi. 12, 13. Mark xi. 15—21.) This was an encouragement to the Gentiles to come and worship God at his temple; and it implied that the spiritual sacrifices of praise and prayer, springing from faith and love, were the most acceptable to him: (Notes, Ps. l. 7—15. 22, 23:) but it especially and most expressly predicted the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, and their admission into the Christian church, which were typified by Mount Zion and the temple.—'What Calvin saith upon the place, ...'The prophet uses such expressions with relation to the gospel—'times as are taken from the usages of his own time;' ... 'is a good rule of explaining the idioms of the prophetic writings.' Lowth.—The Lord also assured the eunuchs, who laid hold of his covenant and were obedient to his word; that he would admit them into his family, and give them an everlasting name and place in heaven, far preferable to the feeble satisfaction, which men enjoy from the hope of being remembered after death, in the children which they leave behind them. (Note, 1 Sam. i. 8.)—The repeated mention of keeping the sabbath, in this place, which evidently gives a decided preference to spiritual worship and holiness of life above all external observances, and refers to the time when the ceremonial law would be abrogated; strongly implies the obligation of the Christian sabbath. (Notes, lviii. 12, 13. Matt. xii. 7, 8.)—Cut off, &c. (5) Note, lv. 12, 13.

V. 8. JEHOVAH, who "gathered the outcasts of Israel," (Marg. Ref. z.) here promises to gather more unto him, than had already been gathered. (Notes, xi. 11—16. Gen. xlix. 10.) This predicts the conversion of the Gentiles to Christianity in far greater numbers, than they ever had been proselyted to Judaism: but it may also look forward to the future gathering of the outcast Jews into the church, and the consequent bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles. V. 9—12. Under the terms “watchmen,” and “shepherds,” both the priests, and scribes, and civil magistrates seem to have been intended; the teachers and rulers of Israel, especially the former: but this severe rebuke was probably expressed in general terms, that it might equally apply to similar characters in other ages and places. There might be many such in the prophet’s time, whose likeness he delineated; and still more, before the captivity, who resembled them: but it was most generally and exactly verified in the character of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, in the days of Christ, and just before the destruction of the city and temple by the Romans. The nation in general was given up to wickedness; but the chief blame belonged to the corrupt teachers and rulers. (Notes, Jer. v. 26—31. xxiii. 13—15.) Through their supineness and profligacy, the nation was exposed to ruin; and the Roman armies were summoned to execute vengeance upon it, under the figure of the wild beasts of the forest being called on, to come and devour a neglected flock of sheep. (Notes, Jer. xii. 7—9. Ez. xxxix. 17—20. Rev. xix. 17—21.) The watchmen were so blinded and ignorant, that they saw no danger. The shepherd’s dog could bark when the wolf came; but they were “dumb dogs, and could not bark;” they were neither capable of instructing the people, nor inclined to do any thing towards it; for they were lazy, drowsy, and utterly insensible. But, though they did not copy the faithfulness and vigilance of the dog; yet they were more greedy than that animal, and their rapacity could not be satisfied. They did not understand their duty as shepherds: but they were sufficiently quick-sighted and attentive to their interest; and every one was looking out to see what lucre he could acquire in his peculiar station and connexion, by any means whatever. They were likewise equally luxurious and intemperate; and expected a perpetuity and an increase of prosperity and self-indulgence, when they were upon the brink of ruin! (Notes, xxviii. 1—8. Ez. xxii. 24—31. Hos. iv. 7—11. Mic. ii. 11. Matt. xxiv. 45—51. Luke xii. 15—21, vv. 18, 19. xxi. 34—56.)—Alas! how many, in every age of the church hitherto, might here, as in a mirror, have recognized their own likeness, if they had not been blind! And how many might do it, at this day, not only in Popish, but in Protestant countries, were it not for the same reason. (Note, Jam. i. 22—25.)—Sleeping. (10) Marg.—“Dreaming; Ενυπνιάζομενοι.” Sept.—(Jude 8. Gr.) The original word occurs no where else. (Notes, 2 Pet. i. 10—19. Jude 5—13.)—We will fill ourselves. (12) “We will be drunken.” So the word signifies. “Let us swill strong drink.” Bp. Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

We cannot indeed be justified by our own works; but we cannot be saved in our sins: they therefore who, “through the Spirit, wait for the hope of righteousness by faith,” will be found walking in the ways of holy obedience. (Note, Gal. v. 1—6.) There can be no piety without honesty, or acceptable honesty without piety. He then is the happy man, who lays hold of the precepts, as well as the promises, of God’s word; who hallows the day, and attends on the ordinances, of the Lord; who “abhorreth that which is evil, and cleaveth to that which is good;” and who thus “waits for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.” (Notes, Ps. i. 1—3. xv. 1—5. P. O. Notes, xxiv. 3—6. Jude 20, 21.) Thanks be to God, we are none of us at present separated from him or his people by any thing, unless it be by wilful sin and unbelief: and if we come “to join ourselves unto him, to choose the things that please him, and to take hold of his covenant; to love his name, and to be his servants;” we shall be sure of acceptance, through the one oblation of our great High Priest. We are now “come to mount Zion, and to the city of the living God;” (Notes, Heb. xii. 18—25;) and may expect to be made joyful in the house of prayer, while our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to him through Jesus Christ. (Notes, Heb. xiii. 15, 16. 1 Pet. ii. 4—6.) And should any of those, who are interested in these blessings, be childless, or afflicted with bodily infirmity of any kind, they need not disquiet themselves: “the comforts of religion will counterbalance all external trials;” “a name and place” in the family of God are far preferable to a numerous offspring; and his everlasting mercies far better riches than the treasures of this world. Let us then seek all our felicity from the God of salvation, and walk with him “in all his commandments and ordinances blameless;” and let us rejoice in the assurance, that he, who has gathered us poor out-casts into his family, will gather others besides those, and more, immensely more than all those, who have hitherto been gathered to him.

V. 9—12.

Alas! the visible church has hitherto been very grievously corrupted, through blind watchmen and ignorant teachers, who like dogs can bark at the sheep, and bite, nay greedily devour them; but seem at league with the wolf and lion, from which they ought to defend the fold. who cannot through ignorance, or will not through slothfulness, preach the truths of God to the people, to warn them from the wrath to come, and will not permit others, if they can help it: who are ever in pursuit of preferment, and after having added one source of emolument to another, are yet dissatisfied: who are asleep and dreaming of worldly pleasure, when they should be preaching and praying; but are awake, and keep a sharp look out, when “filthy lucre” from any quarter can be obtained: who never study, and do not understand, any part of their pastoral duty, but know very well how to fleece the flock, and to make the most of their incomes: who are as lavish and luxurious in spending, as they are rapacious in getting; wasting those benefices in intemperance, or magnificence and the pride of life; or employing them in enriching and aggrandizing their families, which were given to be used in charity and hospitality! and, who are often encouraging each other in sensuality, filling themselves with strong drink, and presumptuously expecting that “to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant;” when they, and those that blindly mistake such hirelings for shepherds, are about to “fall into the ditch together.” From such pastors, O Lord, deliver thy church: open the eyes of those, to whom any part of this character belongs, to see their guilt and danger. that they may escape them! teach those, “who have the rule” over thy people, to set their faces against such abuses, and to exclude such blind guides, such dumb, greedy dogs, such covetous and sensual watchmen, from the sacred function; and to oppose them by a contrary example, as well as by authority. And oh! send us pastors after thine own heart, to feed thy people with knowledge and understanding; that we may rejoice in thy holy name, and that believers may be daily added to thy church: even so be it, Lord Jesus thou good and chief Shepherd of the sheep. Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. LVII. V. 1, 2. This chapter and the next are written in so general a manner, that they may accord to several different periods of the Jewish history. But they are equally applicable to the state of the Christian church, during the prevalence of papal idolatry and superstition: and, if we may suppose any order or connexion in this part of the book, we must conclude, that they refer to those times; for we shall soon find the prophet speaking, in the most evident manner, of the glorious events which will succeed the fall of every antichristian power.—In the conclusion of the preceding chapter, the extreme wickedness of the rulers and teachers of the church was pointed out, as one sign of approaching judgments: here the disregarded removal of the righteous is mentioned as another. They are said to “perish,” not with reference to themselves, but to the irreparable loss sustained by their survivors: though none were duly affected by it, or considered that the Lord took the righteous away in mercy and love, that they might not be involved in those calamities, which their prayers, labours, and example could no longer retard. But “he enters into peace;” his soul being removed to heaven, his body sleeps as in a bed till the resurrection: and this is the case with every one, who has walked before God in integrity and uprightness. The death of Josiah, who was taken away before vengeance was poured out on the Jews, may be predicted as an illustration of this general truth. (Notes, 2 Kings xxii. 15—20. xxiii. 29, 30.)—“The soul of the righteous shall be in joy; and their body shall rest in the grave, unto the time of the resurrection; because they walked before the Lord.”—Taken away. (1) Or, Gathered “to their fathers.”—Beds. (2) Or, Graves. (Note, xiv. 18—20. 2 Chr. xvi. 13, 14.)

V. 3—6. JEHOVAH here summons apostates and hypocrites to appear before him. They are not the genuine children of Abraham, or the sons of God and the church; but the sons of a sorceress, the increase of adultery and whoredom: “the seed of the adulterer, and of her who commits whoredom:” they were descended from parents, who had been guilty of these crimes, and they resembled them in their conduct. They were more properly "the synagogue of Satan," than the church of God, and Babylon's children rather than Jerusalem's. 'Men are in 'scripture called the children of those, whose practices 'they imitate. John viii. 39. 41. 44.' Lowth.—By whoredom and adultery we may understand idolatry; and idolaters are represented as the offspring of the adulterous church and her paramours. They are charged with having derided the servants and children of God, expressing their scorn by every contemptuous gesture; and diverting themselves by mocking them: not considering that they despised God in his people. This they did to be revenged of the prophets, who reprov'd them for their sins: but could they deny, that they were children of disobedience, and hypocrisy? Being eagerly bent upon idolatry, they performed their worship under every green tree: and, whilst they adored proud, ambitious, revengeful, cruel, intemperate, and licentious deities; the imagined characters, pretended exploits, and abominable rites of these idols, inflamed them with every diabolical and sensual lust: so that they even sacrificed their children, in lonely valleys, and in the caverns of the rocks. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2—5. Hos. iv. 10—14.) They were accustomed to take stones from the brooks, to set them up, and to anoint them with oil: and whenever they met with a stone of this kind, they paid a stupid worship to it, with drink-offerings and meat-offerings, as if it had been their god and portion! And indeed they were likely to have all the happiness, which such deities would allot them, and no other: for could they suppose that the Lord would take pleasure in idolaters, or even endure them? 'Accordingly Theophrastus has marked this as a strong feature in the character of the superstitious man: ... ^g Gal. ii. 12, 13. V. 7, 8. Here the idolatrous church is represented as a woman, who has violated her marriage-covenant, and is grown impudent in her adulteries. The idol-temples, (which were as the adulterous bed,) were built upon the highest mountains, to which the worshippers openly ascended to offer sacrifice. Yet they had in their own houses, behind the doors and on the posts, miniature pictures, or small images, of their deities, to put them in remembrance of that publick solemnity. (Notes, Deut. xxvii. 15. Acts xix. 23—31, vv. 24, 25.) Thus they shamelessly violated their covenant with God, by worshipping idols; they multiplied the objects of their abominable worship, and solemnly covenanted with them, as if enamoured of them at first sight. (Notes, Ez. xvi. 15—29. xxiii.)

V. 9, 10. The kings and people of Israel, and even of Judah, often paid court, and made presents, to the idolatrous kings of Egypt or Assyria; and, entering into confederacy with them, they conformed to their customs, and worshipped their gods: and thus debased themselves to the lowest degree of infamy. (Notes, xxx. 6, 7. 2 Chr. xxviii. 20—33. Hos. xii. 1, 2.) They sent their ambassadors also to a great distance; and wearied themselves in long journeys. And they would not despair of help in this way, though often rebuked and punished for it: for they allayed their present fears, and shifted off present dangers, by such expedients; and therefore they were not grieved, or did not faint, on account of the trouble and hardship attending them.—Many of the preceding expressions accord to the idolatry of the Jews: but the self-imposed austerities, the laborious and multiplied superstitions, and the expensive observances of popery, seem also to be described. The antichristian worship of images, and of saints and angels; the pilgrimages, penances, and indulgences of papists; their dispensations, and oblations, or legacies to the priests, that by masses and prayers, they might deliver souls out of purgatory; far better answer to this passage, than any idolatries practised by the Jews: and the king before-mentioned seems to point out the head of the antichristian church, to whom, during many ages, men flocked with presents and tributes from every part of the western world; debasing themselves even to hell by their abject submissions. And, though wearied with the burdens imposed on them; yet they persevered in their way, deeming obedience to the Romish hierarchy "the life of "their souls;" expecting to merit heaven by these works of their own hands; and not grieving at any labour or expense, to soothe their consciences and buoy up their confidence.

company, of whom they had been afraid, that they falsely professed to pay any regard to him, or that they had broken their covenant with him? for had they truly feared him, they would have avoided and abhorred their abominations: so that their hypocrisy was a needless sin. They did not really remember him and his law, or lay to heart the important concern; and his patience and silence for a long time, as if he had not regarded them, emboldened them to cast off his fear, and to expect impunity in their crimes. (Notes, Ps. i. 16—21, v. 21. Ec. viii. 11—13.) But he would shew openly the nature of their righteousness and works, and prove them to be worthless and unprofitable.—This seems peculiarly applicable to that church, which holds the doctrine of the merit of good works, in the most exorbitant sense; and yet sets the highest value upon unmeaning forms and worthless superstitions, observance of the rules of this or the other founder of a monastick order, nay often on acts of idolatrous worship: and the Lord left that church for many ages to go on, as if he had taken no notice of her; which was never the case with the nation of Israel: nor did the Israelites suppose, that they merited, and should be justified, by their idolatries.

V. 13. The idolaters are here supposed to be in extreme terror, and crying to the Lord for deliverance; but they are sent to their companies of idols, and idolatrous connexions, for help. (Notes, Judg. x. 13—16. 2 Kings iii. 13, 14. Jer. ii. 26—30.) Yet they and their confidences would be alike carried away by the wrath of the Almighty, as by a vehement wind, into utter ruin.—This also is applicable to the destruction of Antichristians, notwithstanding their companies of mediators, and of tutelary saints and angels: while those, who trust in the LORD according to his word, will be owned as his true people; and he will dwell among them, as in Canaan, and on mount Zion, with his ancient church.

V. 14. Or, “One shall say:” or, “I will say;” for so it may be rendered merely by altering the vowel-points. The Lord will say, or send one to say, “Cast ye up, &c.”—It is, however, the word of God to his ministers and servants, to prepare the way for those who trust in him, and for sinners to return to him. They are commanded to level the road, and make it straight, casting it up as a causeway, and removing every thing which might cause the weak or inadvertent to stumble. (Notes, xl. 3—5. lxii. 10—12. Heb. xii. 12, 13.) There may be some allusion to the return of the Jews from Babylon: but the prophecy evidently relates to the return of sinners unto God, and the walk of believers through this world to heaven. The preparation for this is made, by clearly stating the truths, and proclaiming the invitations and promises, of the Gospel; by shewing the love of Christ, and the way of acceptance and of holiness; by obviating difficulties, answering objections, guarding against dangerous errors and extremes, and detecting the snares and wiles of Satan and of wicked men. But it may also relate to the interpositions of Providence, in removing those stumbling blocks, which are thrown in the way, by the corruptions, errors, wickedness, and contentions, which prevail within the church. (Note, Matt. xviii. 7—9.) The occasions of idolatry were carefully removed after the captivity: the apostles and faithful ministers in every age, have obeyed this command: but the ruin of Antichrist’s kingdom, and the removal of those enormous scandals and abuses, which have so long obstructed the promulgation of the gospel, seem especially predicted.

V. 15, 16. The Jews, even when addicted to idolatry, gloried in their magnificent temple and worship: the Christian church has been greatly corrupted by an attachment to splendid externals: and few of the human race have judged properly, of that simplicity and spirituality, which are the excellency of divine worship; (Note, John iv. 21—24;) or of the value of a broken heart, above all notions, forms, gifts, visions, or revelations. These lessons are here inculcated. The Lord declares his essential glory and majesty in the sublimest language: “The high and lofty One, who inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy.” As eternity is the habitation of his immutable existence, and holiness is his nature; so “the high and holy place” of heaven is his special residence, in respect of his sovereign and universal government, and the immediate manifestation of his glory. But he has also a habitation on earth, in which he peculiarly delights, (even more than in the temple on mount Zion, except as it typified the human nature of Christ;) and that is, the heart which is broken down under the sense of guilt and unworthiness and deeply humbled before him; which is crushed, as i

(Notes, John xiv. 18-24.) For though he alarms, convinces, and distresses them, by shewing them his majesty, justice, and holiness, and their own guilt and depravity;
and for a time contends with them by frowns, and rebukes, and corrections: yet, the end being answered, he will

V. 17, 18. The people are here stated to have imitated the covetousness of their rulers and teachers:
(Note, lvi. 9-12:) and this covetousness was connected with iniquity, fraud, oppression, or extortion: therefore the Lord smote Israel, or Judah, and hid his face from him. Under these rebukes he went on frowardly, in the way of his own perverse heart. But though the Lord saw his wicked ways and hated them; yet of his own mere grace he intended to convert and heal him, to take him under his tuition and guidance, and to comfort him, and those who lamented and mourned over his calamities.— This may be understood of the conduct of Judah previous to the Babylonish captivity, and during that calamity; and of the freeness of God's mercy in his restoration. (Notes, xliii. 22-25. xlv. 22. Jer. xxxi. 18-20.
Ez. xxxvi. 31, 32. Hos. ii. 6-17. Rom. v. 20, 21.)
—But the nation of Israel was more peculiarly addicted to covetousness in the time of Christ, and previously to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; their strictest professors of religion “devouring widows’ houses, and for a pretence making long prayers.” For this and other sins the Lord was wroth, and smote them, and they have ever since gone on “frowardly in the way of their own hearts,” and covetousness has all along been the charac-teristick of the nation, even to a proverb. Yet the Lord will surely convert and save Judah, and become again his Guide and Comforter, for his own name's sake. This seems the more immediate meaning of the prophecy: yet the avarice of the church of Rome, her enormous exactions, and her infamous traffick for indulgences, dispensations, and other scandalous impositions, must occur to the attentive reader's mind; and also the promises of God to recover his church from this corrupt state, into which it has been so long sunk.—By covetousness, in scripture, we must generally understand the inordinate love of lucre, whether to hoard, or to lavish in luxury and indulgence.

V. 19. (Note, Eph. ii. 14-18.) This verse points out the method, by which God revives, purifies, and comforts his church. He raises up faithful ministers to preach his word; he qualifies them for their work, and gives them their message; he creates in their hearts that zeal for his glory, and compassion for souls, which produce earnest and constant preaching of the gospel, “the fruit of their “lips;” by which peace of every kind is proclaimed to Jews and Gentiles, far and near, and thus numbers are converted and healed. (Notes, Matt. x. 11-15. Acts ii.
37-40. x. 36-43. 2 Cor. v. 18-21.)—In this way religion was revived among a remnant of the Jews, and the Gentiles were called into the church: thus that nation shall be again converted, the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Zion's wounds and breaches shall be healed. The text may also refer to the mercies through the gospel bestowed on multitudes, the gratitude excited in their hearts, and the spiritual worship rendered by them: for the Lord “creates the fruit of the lips,” by teaching and exciting sinners, having embraced the message of salvation, to offer unto him the spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving. (Notes, Hos. xiv. 1-3. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)

V. 20, 21. Wicked men cannot share that inward peace, which springs from the mercy and grace of God.
Their turbulent passions, polluting lusts, and unquiet con-sciences, render them like the tempestuous, restless ocean, when ceaseless dashings against the shore “cast up mire “and dirt:” so that, whatever external changes take place, “there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.” The promises before given therefore must not be so explained, as to encourage men to expect reconciliation to God, and peace of conscience, without “repentance and works meet “for repentance:” but to excite them to believe and hope and pray, that he would give them repentance, and forgiveness of sins, through the promised Redeemer, and according to the gospel: as all the impenitent and uncon-verted would be given up to final destruction. (Notes, iii.
10, 11. xlviii. 20-22. Acts iii. 19-21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1-8.

The death of the righteous is the greatest gain to themselves, and the greatest loss to others, which can be imagined. They are exempted from the evils, that are impending over guilty nations and churches; but their removal portends, and makes way for divine judgments.
yet alas, this is seldom attended to, and scarcely ever duly laid to heart.—In all events true believers are safe and happy: and even their graves are quiet beds, in which

CHAP LVIII.

The prophet is commanded boldly to reprove hypocrisy 1, 2. He shews that pride, injustice, and op-

they sleep in Jesus, and from which he will shortly awake them to everlasting joy and felicity. (Notes, 1 Thes. iv. 13—18. Rev. xiv. 12, 13, v. 13.)—The enormous wickedness of those, who are favoured with the word and ordinances of God, is a lamentable demonstration of human depravity. The spurious brood, which hypocrisy, superstition, and fanaticism have engendered, within the visible church, will easily be distinguished, notwithstanding names and splendid pretences, from her genuine children; and be punished with more marked severity than any other transgressors. We ought then neither to be disconcerted, nor exasperated, if they treat us, as Ishmael did Isaac, with mockery and derision in every form. (Notes, Gen. xxi. 8—12. Gal. iv. 21—31.) Scoffs and calumny are their weapons, when more destructive instruments are placed out of their reach. Yet they little think against whom they sport themselves, when they ridicule and mock the humble and faithful servants of the Lord: but he will shortly convict and expose them, silence their mockery and boastings, and shew them to be “children of transgression, a seed of falsehood.”—Men naturally love a religion, which inflames and authorizes their unholy passions: and there is no absurdity so palpable, no cruelty, even to their own children or bodies, however horrid, of which they are not capable, if seduced into an opinion, that it will atone for their crimes, and purchase indulgence for the favourite lust; if it can be made subservient to the gratification of their pride and ambition; or if it will quiet their consciences, and aid them to hope for happiness, without Christ, or without holiness. This developes that “mystery of iniquity,” namely, of idolatry, Pagan, Jewish, or Antichristian: the whole has been suited to one or other of these purposes. And so entirely does Satan blind the minds of numbers, that they expect that God should delight in, and reward them for, such observances, as he has expressly forbidden and utterly abhors!

V. 9—14.

The zeal which men shew in false religion, the boldness with which they avow their absurdities; their diligence and constancy in publick and private superstitions; the alacrity, with which they weary themselves in burdensome services, or severe penances; the pertinacity, with which they hold fast their delusive hopes, and labour to “establish their own righteousness,” should remind us, who have a better cause, how earnest, constant, patient, and diligent we ought to be. The very devotees of superstition and idolatry avow, that religion is the grand concern; that it should be our main employment and satisfaction; that every thing should be sacrificed to it; and that no labour, loss, or hardship should here be regarded. But we ought at the same time to remember, that except our earnestness be regulated according to the word of God, it will be at best wholly unprofitable. It is vain to dissemble, or to pretend to fear God and seek his glory, if we do not: those who really remember him, will be universally conscientious; and such as allow themselves in known sin, act from some sinister motive which the Lord will detect; and then he will shew the corrupt nature of “their righteousness and “works,” and manifest the reason of his rejecting them. His silence and patience encourage the presumptuous hopes of transgressors: but when he shall arise to judgment, the infidel and profane, the pharisaical and superstitious, the hypocritical and enthusiastical; and all the advocates for vice, or for false religion, will discover their danger: but it will then be too late to cry for help; nor will any of their companions or idols avail them; for they will all be driven into destruction. But those who trust and love our God and Saviour, will “inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world.”—It should therefore be our first care to learn the ways of God ourselves; and then, in our several places, to make them plain to others, and to remove every stumbling block, which obstructs the path. In this respect we have much to do, and much to pray for.—The absurd and wild opinions, which are propagated; and the crimes which are committed, by men professing the doctrines of the gospel; the multiplied controversies acrimoniously agitated among them; the horrible injustice and profligacy of men called Christians, in every quarter of the globe; the corrupt state of almost the whole visible church, in doctrine, discipline, and practice; and the idolatry, imposture, and enormous covetousness of the church of Rome, have long been stumbling blocks to infidels, Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans all over the world. The Lord calls upon Christians and ministers to remove these scandals as much as they possibly can; and we should unite in constant and earnest prayer to him to raise up instruments who may do it effectually.

V. 15—21.

While numbers stumble, and fall, and perish, through the offences which every where abound, it is by their own pride, unbelief, and enmity to God and holiness. “For this high and lofty One, who inhabits eternity, whose name is holy, who dwells in the high and holy place,” delights in those who are “poor in spirit” and broken-hearted, mourners for sin, and supplicants for mercy and grace. He will make his abode with those, whose hearts he has thus humbled, in order to revive and comfort them: “he will not contend for ever” with the penitent soul; he will not drive the contrite to despondency, nor leave him to perish under his frown. Let then no trembling suppliant give way to discouragement, or hard thoughts of God: but let him continue to wait and pray, and ere long he shall be comforted. But though the Lord employs corrections to bring sinners to repentance, and to recover backsliders; yet they are not of themselves effectual. Even believers sometimes go on frowardly for a season, when smitten for their iniquity, and under the hidings of God’s countenance: (Note, Ps. xxxii. 3—5:) and many who seem to be religious in this way, become mere thorny ground, that brings forth no fruit to perfection.—Covetousness is idolatry, and it almost always produces dishonesty and iniquity likewise; yet few are much aware of its malignity. (Notes, Luke xii. 15—21. Eph. v. 3, 4. 1 Tim. vi. 6—10, vv. 9, 10. 2 Pet. ii. 12—16.) But if we have been delivered from this snare, or are recovered from the state here described; we must acknowledge it to be the mere grace of God. He saw us, when we were “walking frowardly in the way of our own hearts,” and graciously determined to heal us by his sanctifying Spirit: thus he began to teach and guide us, and to bring us into the ways of holiness and consolation: (Note, xlii. 13—17, v. 16:) and he has repeatedly recovered us, when we were departing from him; causing us to renew our godly sorrow, and restoring our comforts. The gospel was sent to us when “far off” from God; the influences of the Holy Spirit, by which we were brought near, and that new heart from whence grateful praise, “the fruit of our lips,” originates, are alike his gift. Our salvation, with all its fruits, hopes, and comforts, is his work; it comes from him, and to him belongs all the glory. But the destruction of the wicked is from themselves; their hearts cast up filthy imaginations and desires, and empty themselves in wicked words and works: (Note, Jam. i. 13—18:) their selfish and malignant passions, and constant disappointments and vexations, with anxious forbodings as to the future, exclude them from peace: and as death for ever fixes a man’s character; so those who die in sin will be left eternally proud, revengeful, envious, full of enmity against God and man, and given up to the torments of conscience and the rage of despair. (Note, Prov. xiv. 32.) Were there no other hell, the thoughts of such a condition are enough to harrow up the soul with consternation. Such men are, as it were, turned out of this hospital incurable; because they pertinaciously refuse to be healed, or to use the means of healing. “There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked:” but “let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return to the LORD, and he will have mercy on him, and to our God, and he will abundantly pardon.” (Note, lv. 6, 7.)

NOTES

CHAP. LVIII. V. 1. (Notes, lvii. 15—21.) The prophet, while he protested vehemently against all wickedness, was required especially to “cry aloud” against the crimes of God’s own people; not sparing to reprove them sharply, out of respect to friends, fear of enemies, or regard to interest. He must spend his strength, venture reproach and persecution; and “lift up his voice like a trumpet,” in giving an alarm to the people, and in exposing their hypocrisy. The Lord primarily addressed this command to Isaiah; but it is equally obligatory on the ministers of religion in every age: the prophet might intend his warnings for the hypocrites of his own time; but the Holy Spirit had also those of other ages in view.—The fasts observed by the Jews during the captivity merited the censure here given. (Notes, 3, 4. Zech. vii. 2—7.) The Pharisees in the time of Christ fasted often, in ostentation and hypocrisy, and to cloke oppression and avarice: the great value put upon fasting by the church of Rome, without any regard to a correspondent temper and conduct in other respects, is well known. But Vitringa thinks that this chapter, in its connexion with what precedes and follows, may relate to the reformed, or protestant, churches. They have indeed renounced the idolatry and gross abuses of popery; but are grievously deformed by a worldly spirit and conduct, and great formality in religious duties, where the form is not thrown aside: and this indeed brings the matter home to ourselves.

V. 2. “The house of Jacob,” in the time of Hezekiah, seems to have sat for this picture. They were not openly idolatrous or irreligious; nay, they were earnest and constant in their forms of devotion, “seeking the LORD daily,” and taking pleasure in learning his truths and precepts, as if they were a very righteous nation: (Note, Ez. xxxiii. 30—33:) but they were pleased with these things, merely because they gratified their pride and curiosity, procured them respect and reputation, and increased their presumptuous confidence. Nay, they “asked of God the ways of righteousness, and took delight in approaching him” in his courts; for this was then creditable, and generally done; and it served as an easy commutation for secret injustice, and as a cheap quietus to their consciences. (Notes, i. 10—15. xlviii. 1, 2. 1 Sam. xv. 22—25. Heb. vi. 4—6.)—This has often been the case, both in Israel, and in the Christian church, among papists, and among protestants.

V. 3, 4. The persons here addressed had mortified themselves, with apparent sorrow and contrition, on stated or occasional fasts. (Notes, Lev. xvi. 29—31. Ps. xxxv. 13, 14.) They deemed this very meritorious; and they enquired wherefore the Lord had not noticed their services, and delivered them from their troubles. (Notes, Mic. iii. 9—11. Mal. iii. 13—18. Luke xv. 25—32, v. 29.) But he answered, that, while they denied themselves in one respect, they indulged themselves in others; especially their pride, avarice, and malignant passions. For at the very time, when they seemed to abase themselves before God in fasting; they exacted the full measure of hard labour from their oppressed slaves, or their usurious claims from their starving debtors. Their fasting also served to increase their self-preference, and excited them to fierce controversies, or bitter resentments: it was the cloke of their exactions and oppressions of the poor, whom they most unjustly smote and abused, for not complying in every thing with their inclinations; or the commutation and atonement for this unmerciful conduct. And, surely they should not fast in this hypocritical, ostentatious, and unrighteous manner; or call a day thus spent a fast; or expect that God would accept their services, or hear their prayers; which were merely the labour of their lips, and uttered with a loud voice, but an insincere heart. (Notes, 1 Kings xviii. 27—29. xxi. 8—14. Jer. xxxvi. 8—26. Joel ii. 12—17. Zech. vii. 2—7. Matt. vi. 1—4. 16—18. ix. 14, 15. Luke xviii. 9—14.)

V. 5—7. Could it be supposed, that the fast, which the Lord approved, was “for a man to afflict his soul for a day;” (marg.) with external appearances of sorrow and shame, and with mere transient animal self-denial, without repentance or reformation? The fast which God approved would be attended with the mortification of pride, avarice, and worldly lusts; and with the unequivocal fruits of true repentance. They, who observed such a fast, would loose the bonds of those, whom they had iniquitously enslaved or imprisoned; they would moderate the labours of their servants, and render their services and situation more comfortable; they would cease from usurious exactions, and remit the debts which either were contracted through fraud and oppression, or which the poor debtor was unable to discharge: (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 39—55. Deut. xv. 2. 13—15. Neh. v. 1—13. Jer. xxxiv. 8—17. Jon. iii. 5—10:) they would break every yoke of oppression, and use their authority and influence to protect the poor, or rescue them from the injustice of others. They would also be liberal to the needy according to their wants: and not get out of the way, or frame excuses, to avoid relieving them; remembering that they were of the same nature, and had the same feelings, as themselves. (Notes, 8—12. Acts x. 1—8. Col. iv. 1.) By these things their external humiliation before God, in fasting and prayer, would be shewn to be sincere and profitable: but in no other way.

V. 8—12. When the people should thus “repent, and “do works meet for repentance;” they might expect that their inward peace, or outward prosperity, would break forth and increase like the morning-light; (Notes, ix. 2. lx. 1—3;) and that their personal sicknesses, and disquieted consciences, or their public calamities, would speedily be healed: their good works would go before them as evidences to attest the sincerity of their faith and love, and for “a memorial before God;” and his glorious power and presence would protect them from those dangers, to which they were most exposed, as the guard which covers and protects the rear of an army. (Notes, lii. 11, 12. Ex. xiv. 19, 20. Ps. lxxxv. 10—13. Acts x. 3—8.) He would be as ready to answer their prayers, as they had been to answer the cries of their oppressed and afflicted brethren; whom they now no longer treated with scorn or menaces, or put off with vain pretences or deceitful promises. And when, from their inmost souls, in genuine compassion and love, they were habitually ready to relieve the hungry and distressed; their trouble and inward grief should be exchanged for comfort and joy, resembling the noon-day light. The Lord himself would guide them, and supply their wants in every emergency; cause their bones to be full of marrow through health and plenty; make their souls pleasant and fruitful like a watered garden; and render their consolations abiding like the unfailing springs of water. (Notes, Prov. iii. 7, 8. xi. 24, 25. xiii. 4.) Then should they become the honoured instruments of repairing the waste places of Zion, and building upon those foundations which were laid in former ages, but not further completed; and be named the repairers of Zion's breaches, and the restorers of her ways, that men might come from all around to worship and dwell there. (Notes, lxi. 4—6.

Judg. v. 6, 7.)—This might apply to Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and others, who rebuilt Jerusalem, the temple, and the walls of the city after the captivity: and to all those, in every age, who have been, or shall be, instrumental in promoting true religion: and doubtless, from the church, which shall first and best answer this description, will those instruments be raised up, who will be principally honoured in bringing forward that extensive and glorious promulgation of the gospel, which we are taught to expect and pray for continually.—'This is chiefly meant of the spiritual ' Jerusalem, whose builders were the apostles.'

V. 13, 14. As these prophecies evidently relate, or extend, to the times of the Christian dispensation; a cogent argument may be deduced from them, for hallowing the Lord's day. (Notes, lvi. 3—7. Matt. xii. 7, 8. Acts xx. 7—12, v. 7. Rev. i. 9—11, v. 10.) The rule here given implies, that men must not profane that day by doing their ordinary work, or seeking their secular interest; or by spending it in worldly pleasures and recreations, or sloth and animal indulgence; or by vain and trifling conversation: but that they should delight in the sabbath, as a holy day especially consecrated to the Lord, to be spent in the publick and private duties of religion; honour it above all other days, and honour God on it and for it.
(Notes, Ex. xx. 8—11. Am. viii. 4—10.) Thus they will find much joy and comfort in him, and his service and worship will become more and more delightful to them, (Notes, Ps. lxxxiv. 1, 2. 10;) they will be rendered triumphant over and exalted above their enemies; be plen-tiously provided for, as the Israelites had been in Canaan; and inherit the peculiar blessing, which was the birth-right and heritage of Jacob. (Notes, Gen. xxv. 31—34. xxvii.
27—29. xxviii. 3, 4. 13—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The ministers of God have need, not only of great tenderness and skill to comfort the broken-hearted and tempted believer; but likewise of intrepidity and firmness, that they may "exhort and rebuke, with all authority," those who act inconsistently with their profession. (Note, Tit.

ii. 15.) They should be disinterested, zealous for the glory of God, prepared for persecution, superior to personal considerations, to the fear of men, and the shackles of party and bigotry; that with all plainness they may detect the transgressions, and expose the hypocrisy, of those who "profess to know God, but in works deny him." This requires far more courage in the minister, and will generally expose him to far greater trials, than all possible severity against avowed infidels, profligates, and open opposers of the gospel. Self-love, selfish friends, and injudicious or timid Christians, will say to a man in such a case, "Spare thyself." Ambition, avarice, love of ease, and aversion to the cross will suggest to him, Spare the rich and powerful: but God says "Spare not;" and "we "must obey him, and not men," please him and not ourselves.—When the ministers of the reformed churches shall thus loudly protest against all the iniquity which prevails in them, (as well as against erroneous doctrines, and antichristian abuses,) we may hope to see them still further reformed and purified, and for a more extensive progress of the reformation.—We all need continually to beg of God to assist us in examining ourselves: this appears most clearly, when we consider, how very far men may go in the appearance of religion, with an unsound heart.—As Herod heard John gladly, yet loved his brother's wife more than either God or his own soul; and as they "who "have no root in themselves, may receive the word with "joy;" we should remember, that great delight in outward forms, and religious speculations, may spring from pharisaical pride or diabolical delusion: and it must do so, when it consists with the love, and allowed practice, of one known sin. For, without "repentance and works "meet for repentance," "knowledge puffeth up," faith is dead; hope, presumptuous; joy, carnal; and profession, hateful hypocrisy. Such, as are strangers to "the power "of godliness," either neglect, or grow proud of the form:
in their estimation good works rise in value, in proportion to their scarcity: and when it is owing to God's infinite patience, that they are out of hell; they deem him unjust, if he slightly afflict them, and if he do not reward them with eternal happiness! But the Lord will manifest the corrupt motives of their tasks of reluctant devotion: and their conduct to their poor brethren, whom they enslave, oppress, starve, persecute, and exact on unmercifully, will demonstrate the hypocrisy of their solemn fasts, and ostentatious appearances of piety.—Many, who are very demure, and seem very humble, in the house of God and at his table, are most contentious and tyrannical in their own families; and come from their devotions, to distress and harass their wives, children, domesticks, and dependents, with peevish or bitter words, perverse and severe actions, nay, sometimes with enormous injustice: nor are they

CHAP. LIX.

Impiety, and multiplied iniquities, assigned as the causes of all the calamities endured by the professed people of God, 1—15. Promises that God would rescue his church; take vengeance on his enemies; widely diffuse truth and holiness; stop the torrent of impiety and wickedness; and preserve true religion, by his word and Spirit, to the end of time, 16—21.

more ostentatious in religion, to get the good opinion of ministers and Christians, than vociferous in rage and debates. But it is an invariable rule, that “he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath shewed no mercy:” (Note, Jam. ii. 8—13, v. 13:) God will not forgive our trespasses, if we do not heartily forgive our brethren; and he will mete to us in the measure which we have meted to them. (Notes, Matt. vi. 14, 15. vii. 1, 2. xviii. 31—35.) No expressions of humiliation then can prove that man a true penitent, who does not “loose the bands of wickedness,” renounce his gainful iniquities, and aim to mortify his strongest lusts. No man’s faith justifies him, which does not “work by love;” he who loves God will love his brother also; and he who loves his brother, will do him no injury, but will be ready to do him all the good he can. The professed church of Christ has been too long amused with fasts, and external austerities in some instances, whilst men found pleasures in other things far more suited to their carnal minds; fasts employed as the cloke of avarice and oppression, and the very watch-word of persecution.—Yet, let us not confound the abuse, with the use, of this scriptural method of expressing our godly sorrow and humiliation; but, rejecting the fast which the Lord has not chosen, let us attend to that which he approves and accepts.

V. 8—14.

When the external expressions and means of repentance, faith, and grace, are accompanied with the mortification of sin, reformation of life, and abundant exercises of love to the poor and needy; despising, neglecting, and excluding none from our affection or assistance, according to our ability; we may expect consolation in the ways of God. Such conduct proves our sincerity, and honours the Lord; and he will honour and protect us on every side: our prayers will then be answered, our tribulations removed, or an adequate support afforded; by the light of God’s countenance we shall pass through every dark scene; he will provide for our wants, make our souls like a watered garden, and honour us with usefulness in his church; (Notes, Cant. iv. 15, 16. Jer. xxxi. 10—14;) for “the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance.” Many professed Christians prove themselves hypocrites by a contrary conduct: and many real Christians walk uncomfortably all their days, because their liberality is disproportionate to their affluence: their evidence of sincerity in their professed love of Christ, is therefore low; they little honour God and he little honours them; he dispenses consolation to them, according to their niggardliness to his poor people.—Experience evinces, that they, who in humble faith and love, “draw out their souls to the hungry,” and abound most in “devising liberal things,” are most comfortable, and most honoured to be useful in the church of God; (a sweet reward to their benevolent minds!) and often they have the most outward peace and prosperity. Let us then avoid, with equal caution, pharisaical pride, and antinomian sloth or selfishness: and let those, who walk uncomfortably, examine whether their conduct towards their poor brethren do not point out at once the reason, and the remedy.—True faith unites justice, mercy, and piety: in proportion as we are spiritually minded, we shall hallow, honour, and delight in the sabbaths of God; and, laying aside all employments, pleasures, or discourse, which can interrupt our sacred rest in him, we shall seek communion with him in his publick and private ordinances: without any other remission, than what is really necessary, or what is a work of love to the souls and bodies of our neighbours and fellow Christians. Thus we shall learn to delight in God, and to anticipate heaven; we shall obtain the victory over the world, sin, and Satan; we shall follow those, “who through faith and patience inherit the promises;” and we shall at last be ‘numbered with his saints in glory everlasting;’ for “the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.”

NOTES.

CHAP. LIX. V. 1, 2. This chapter continues the subject of the preceding; and begins with a further reply to those, who complained that God did not regard their fasting and prayers. (Note, lviii. 3, 4.) What has therefore been observed, of the times to which that refers, applies to this also: and as the latter part of this chapter, and the whole of that which follows, must be understood of the millennium; so (whatever reference there may be to previous situations of the Jewish or Christian church,) there is some reason to think, with Vitranga, that the low state of the Reformed or Protestant churches, antecedent to that event, is here predicted. If we reflect on the state of these churches, in respect of evangelical truth and vital religion, we must be convinced, that they have lamentably declined since the reformation: and though popery may perhaps have lost ground, though that is very doubtful; yet infidelity, scepticism, Socinianism, impiety, and vice of every kind, have exceedingly increased. The true people of God are indeed chiefly to be found in those churches: yet they are verging, further and further, from the purity and strictness of the Gospel, in every respect; except as toleration has for a time supplanted the monster persecution: and even this great advantage is attended with an indifference about divine truth; or rather an indifference what errors are maintained, provided men be not zealous for the doctrines of the reformation. We have also reason, from several prophecies, to expect still greater departures from the faith; and grievous calamities to be brought on the nations adhering to the gospel, from those who openly oppose it, whether papists or infidels. It may therefore be supposed, that the Holy Spirit predicts these things in the former part of this chapter, as introductory to the most glorious state of the church on earth: and no events can be mentioned, which are so answerable to what is here foretold, and so connected with what next follows, as to be put in competition with what has been mentioned.—But, whatever be the prophetical meaning of the passage, it contains a sermon generally useful to the church, in all her calamities and distresses.—The prophet reminds the people, not to ascribe the duration of their afflictions, or the delay of an answer to their prayers, to the Lord's want of power or inclination to deliver them, or to his inattention to their requests; but wholly to their unrepented iniquities, which separated betwixt them, and the God whom they professed to worship, and provoked him to hide his face and reject their petitions. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, l. 1—3. Jer. v. 20—25, vv. 24, 25.)

V. 3—8. 'The foregoing chapter contained a severe reproof of the Jews, for their hypocrisy. ... This chapter contains a more general reproof of their wickedness, bloodshed, violence, falsehood, and injustice. At v. 9, they are introduced as making an ample confession of their sins, and deploring their wretched state in consequence of them. On this act of humiliation a promise is given, that God, in his mercy and zeal for his people, will rescue them from this miserable condition; that the Redeemer will come as a mighty hero to deliver them: he will destroy his enemies, convert both Jews and Gentiles to himself, and give them a new covenant and law, which shall never be abolished.' Bp. Lowth. The professed people of God, here described, were guilty of murders, ra-pinés, perjuries, lies, and impiety: none of them demanded justice on delinquents, or pleaded for the truth; either the truth of God's word, or the truth of the causes which came before them. (Notes, Jer. v. 1, 2. 26—31. vii. 3—11. Ez. xxii. 1—16. 24—30.) They trusted in vanity and deceit, and used lying pretences in defending their conduct: they conceived mischief to their neighbours in their hearts, and thence brought forth iniquity in their lives. (Note, Jam. i. 13—15.) With great ingenuity and assiduity they accomplished those projects, which proved pernicious or useless; "hatching cockatrice' eggs, and "weaving the spider's web:" so that he who shared in the fruits of their labour, was seduced into destructive errors and iniquities, or involved in ruin; and when advantage was expected, from their ingenious schemes and persevering efforts, and the egg, so to speak, was hatched, a viper burst forth for their destruction. Nor could their ingenuity in devising schemes, (as the spider frames its web from its own bowels,) to deliver or save themselves, become garments to cover them, or their own works justify them: indeed they would appear to be works of injustice and violence. (Notes, xxviii. 20. lvii. 11, 12.) They lost no time, and spared no pains to do evil, and to shed innocent blood: all their thoughts were employed about iniquity; and wherever they went, devastation and destruction attended their paths. They had no acquaintance with the ways of peace, judgment, and justice; and they walked in such crooked and winding paths of subtle policy and selfishness, that none, who go in them, can know any thing of peace with God, or true peace of heart and conscience. (Notes, xlviii. 20—22. lvii. 20, 21. Ps. cxxv. 4, 5. Rom. iii. 9—18.)—Alas! how exactly does this correspond with the conduct and character of very numerous protestant Christians, in every quarter of the globe.

V. 9—15. The pious remnant here lament the publick calamities, the decay of religion, and the darkness which rests upon their path. (Notes, l. 10, 11. lviii. 8—12.) Because of the enormous wickedness of the professed people of God, he stood at a distance; and did not execute judgment between them and their avowed enemies, and they were unjustly oppressed without redress. They waited for more prosperous times and brighter prospects; but the darkness continued to increase: they groped for the wall to lean against, or to direct their path; or they wandered out of the way like blind men: they stumbled at noon, as if it were midnight; that is, they were at a loss and made fatal mistakes in the most obvious matters: (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 29. Job v. 11—16, v. 14:) and they were neglected, as the dead are cast out into unfrequented places. Their loud complaints were like the “roaring of bears,” their continual lamentation like the “mourning of doves:” (Note, xxxviii. 14, 15:) whilst they in vain waited for judgment, and deliverance from their oppressors. But they confessed that by their multiplied sins, of which they were conscious, and which testified against them, they deserved all their sufferings. For rebellion, hypocrisy, apostasy from God, oppression, fraud, false-witness, and every kind of injustice abounded among them: so that truth and equity were openly perverted, trampled on, or banished. ‘Justice is described as if it were afraid to venture itself ‘among such a crew of miscreants.’ Lowth. All sincerity and integrity were openly renounced; and if any one ventured to be so singular as to make a conscience of his duty, he became a prey to his less scrupulous neighbours, or was treated by them as a fool or a madman. And no wonder, that the Lord was displeased, at beholding such enormous wickedness among those, who professed to be his worshippers.

V. 16—19. When it might have been expected, that the Lord would denounce or inflict the severest vengeance on those, who had so greatly provoked him; behold he appears, to introduce the most glorious triumphs of his grace! (Notes, xliii. 22—28. xlv. 1—5. 21, 22.) When none in comparison were left to protest against the wickedness which prevailed, or to intercede with God to interpose and fulfil his promises; (Notes, lxiv. 6—8. Jer. v. 1—6. Ez. xxii. 30;) then his own arm would effect the salvation which he intended: and his righteous regard to his promises, to the cause of godliness, and the honour of his law, and his just indignation against his enemies, would sustain him! His fixed purpose of executing justice on some, and of saving others, would be as his breast-plate and helmet: but vengeance would be as his military vest; and zeal for his own glory would be conspicuous above all, as a cloke. (Notes, xi. 2—5. lxiii. 1—6, v. 5. Ps. xciii. 1, 2. civ. 1, 2. Rev. xix. 11—16.) Thus armed for the conflict and prepared for judgment, he would deal with men according to their deeds; executing vengeance upon his obstinate enemies, to the most remote regions of the earth, and receiving humble penitents to his mercy and favour. Then would men fear and worship his name from the most western regions to the most eastern; for instance, Britain, America, the East Indies, China, or Japan: and at the very time when Satan, the great enemy of God and his church, would come in to bear down all before him, by an inundation of antichristian superstition, infidelity, impiety, and wickedness; “the Spirit of God would lift up a standard,” and call together his armies, to oppose his progress, and subvert his cause. (Notes, xi. 10. Ez. xxxviii. Dan. xi. 40—45. Joel iii. 9—17. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. Rev. xii. 13—17. xvii. 15—18. xix. 11—21. xx. 7—10.)—There can be no doubt, the grand accomplishment of this prophecy is future: and as they, among whom iniquity so abounded, antecedent to this happy change, are spoken of as the professed people of God, and never accused of idolatry; and as the Lord is represented as wondering, that there was no intercessor among them; it is more natural to interpret it of corrupt and degenerate protestants, than

The coming of the divine Redeemer in human nature, for our salvation, seems to be here immediately predicted; yet along with the effects of his gospel in the primitive times, and in all succeeding ages; and with reference to his coming, by the power of his Spirit, to purify, deliver, and enlarge his church. (Notes, 16—19. xi. 1—9.) JEHOVAH here covenants with Christ as our Surety, and with those true Israelites who turn from their transgressions by faith in his name, to continue the Spirit which rests on Christ, and the words or doctrine which he has delivered to his church, among his spiritual seed, in the mouths of his ministers who preach it, and of his people who profess it, from age to age, to the end of the world: so that “the gates of hell shall never prevail” against his truth and grace; but there shall always be a remnant to believe, profess, obey, and preach the gospel, through successive generations: till that period arrives, before predicted, but more fully declared in the next chapter; when the cause of truth and righteousness shall gain a decided, universal, and permanent victory. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

When our troubles continue, notwithstanding our prayers, and expectations of deliverance, we should examine seriously and earnestly into the cause. We may be sure, that “the LORD’s hand is not shortened, ... neither is his ear heavy;” he is as able to save, and as ready to hear prayer, as in former times: but iniquity, unrepented, unmortified, unpardoned iniquity, will separate between our souls and God, and cause him to hide his face, and to refuse any comfortable answer: so that nothing but true repentance and faith in Christ can remove the separation, and make way for returning peace. (Notes, Josh. vii. 10—12. P. O. 10—18.)—Alas, what crimes have, in every age, filled, and defiled the earth! But it is most lamentable, that the professed worshippers of God, who have the purest creeds in their books, and the most scriptural administration of ordinances among them; and who profess against heresy, superstition, and idolatry, with decided vehemence and pertinacity; are often guilty of multiplied murders, rapines, oppressions, perjuries, lies, blasphemies, and impieties! Nay, these criminals often escape with impunity, and have able advocates retained to extenuate their guilt, and varnish over their crimes; while scarcely any venture to “call for justice, or plead for truth,” through fear of reproach, and of formidable enemies! But, except the grace of God convert the heart, men will in one way or other “trust in vanity and lies,” “conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity.”—Not only do we find enormous wickedness among rapacious oppressors, and powerful wasters of mankind: the schools of philosophers often produce more specious, but still more fatal instruments of destruction. With exquisite ingenuity and persevering application, studious men hatch impious and infidel systems: these gratify the curiosity, pride, and presumption of man, and are congenial to his carnal mind and soothing to his conscience. Compositions of this fatal tendency are often framed with the most specious arguments, ornamented with enchanting elegance, and varnished over with plausible pretensions to candour, liberality of sentiment, and free enquiry. On this delicious poison numbers feed and perish; in these nests are hatched basilisks and vipers, the brood of the old Serpent; and from thence they break forth with envenomed teeth, to destroy the souls of men. Others are not employed in so pestiferous a manner: but they ingeniously weave a spider’s web, and compared with their own schemes of self-effected salvation, they despise that “righteousness of God, which is unto all and upon all that believe.” (Notes, Rom. iii. 21—26. x. 1—4.) Yet their webs shall not become garments; neither shall any of their devices cover the shame of their nakedness, or preserve them from detection and the wrath of God. (Notes, xxviii. 20. Rev. iii. 17—19.) And it is observable, that protestants, who have renounced the Reformers’ doctrine of justification by faith, through the righteousness of Christ alone, to trust in their own works, are in general remarkably defective in the very appearance of good works. Many of them deem it very meritorious not to perpetrate such crimes, as would expose them to the lash of human laws; and many of them “do works of iniquity, and the act of violence is in their hands.” Indeed the feet of every man, who is destitute of the Spirit of Christ, “run swiftly to evil” of one kind or another: and the history of mankind and daily observation shew, that where the restraints of fear, shame, and human laws are removed, and men can do it with impunity, their mad passions render them in haste to shed innocent blood. But while they waste and destroy others, regardless alike of justice, truth, and humanity; they are themselves strangers to peace and comfort: others watch their opportunity of retaliation; and their crooked paths lead them far aside from the way of peace and salvation. (Note, Ps. cxix. 155.)

V. 9—21

When the general character of any church or community, where Christianity is professed, becomes corrupt and abandoned, it is reasonable to expect, that it will be left in the hands of its enemies: and vain will be the hope of deliverance or prosperity, without repentance. For their heinous crimes, men are given up to be deluded and infatuated; to grope, and stumble in the clearest and most obvious concerns; and to proceed from one delusion and calamity to another, till they sink into the dark pit of destruction. They may complain, and groan, and murmur, under their calamities, and make trial of many and varied methods of deliverance: but nothing will effectually profit them, so long as they reject Christ and his gospel, and go on in impenitent wickedness: and the few, who are not utterly blinded, will readily perceive the justice of God in all their miseries, whilst they witness such multiplied and continued iniquities. Should the Lord thus visit this protestant land, would not our transgressions testify against us? Could it be denied, that we have grievously offended “in transgressing, and lying against the LORD, in departing from our God;” in oppression and rebellion; and in the most scandalous and base prevarication, or direct falsehood, in the most sacred ordinances, solemn professions and subscriptions? Alas! “judgment is,” in many respects, “turned backward, and justice standeth afar off;” “for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter. “Yea, truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil” often “maketh himself a prey,” or is deemed a prodigy and a derision: “this, the LORD seeth, and is displeased.” But we have yet a considerable number of exceptions to the too general rule: many still venture to protest against the wickedness of the times, and present continual supplications, through our heavenly Advocate, for the revival of religion, and the purity and enlargement of the church. What it may please God to do with us as a nation, we know not: but if none be left to intercede, his own arm will accomplish his predicted salvation, and “his righteousness” “will sustain him,” in preserving and enlarging his church. Armed with “the breast-plate of righteousness, and the “helmet of salvation,” and arrayed with the garments of vengeance and zeal, he will ere long go forth, crush his enemies, and spread his gospel from shore to shore, throughout the earth. (Marg. Ref.) So that, in every sense, when the enemy of our souls comes in like a flood, we may expect that the Spirit of God will lift up a standard against him. Let us then plead this promise in respect of the progress of infidelity, heresy, and impiety, which seem about to deluge our land, and the nations professing the doctrines of the reformation. Indeed the astonishing changes, which have taken place, in this land, and on the continent, and in the East, since these observations were first written, (1790,) and the establishment of Bible Societies, and Mission Societies, in such an extensive manner, since that crisis, are an evident fulfilment of this prophecy: especially by the British and Foreign Bible Society, the “Spirit of God has lifted up a standard” against the deluge of infidelity which preceded, and seemed ready to prevail against the kingdom of the Redeemer. Yet the enemy practises and prospers, in divers forms: and we should deeply lament the evils which still prevail; but we need not despond: the covenant stands sure with our Redeemer and his whole family; and every one, whom he has “turned from transgression,” may take comfort from it. His Spirit shall be communicated and his truth continued in his church, to the end of the world, in defiance of all the power, subtlety, and malice of earth and hell: and his cause shall as certainly gain a complete victory on earth; as every true believer becomes more than conqueror, when the Lord receives him to his glory in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. LX. V. 1—3. (Notes, xxx. 23—26. xlix. 18—23.) Nothing occurs in the history of the Jews after the captivity, which at all accomplished the prophecy in this chapter. That nation never enjoyed such permanent peace and prosperity, as it had done in the days of David and Solomon: but in this chapter events are predicted inexpressibly more glorious. Even the happy change, which took place on the coming of Christ, and after his ascension, did not by any means answer to this description. The church was indeed greatly enlarged and purified; but it remained in great tribulation, and passed through successive persecutions, till the conversion of Constantine. Then it had a short season of external prosperity: but its purity had previously been greatly tarnished, and soon became much more so: it was speedily filled with time-serving hypocrites, split into furious parties, deformed with grievous heresies, and disgraced with abominable wickedness. And, not long after, the Roman empire was overwhelmed, and the church was afflicted with dire calamities, which continued with little intermission, till antichristian idolatry and superstition had gained a complete ascendancy in the western, and Mohammedism greatly entrenched on the eastern, division of the church. (Notes, Rev. viii. ix. xii. —xiv.) So that nothing has yet occurred which corresponds with these predictions; and they are therefore reasonably concluded to relate principally to future events.—

‘The subject of this chapter is the great increase and flourishing state of the church of God, by the conversion and accession of the heathen nations to it, which is set forth in such ample and exalted terms, as plainly shew, that the full completion of this prophecy is reserved for future times. This subject is displayed in the most splendid colours, under a great variety of images highly poetical, designed to give a general idea of the glories of that perfect state of the church of God, which we are taught to expect in the latter times; when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and the Jews shall be converted and gathered from their dispersions; and “the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.”’ Bp. Lowth.—The church is here addressed as a disconsolate female, sitting on the ground, in a dark place and obscure situation: this female is the emblem of Zion, or Jerusalem, and the imagery is taken from the walls and gates of that city; and from the temple and its ornaments, treasures, sacrifices, and worship, all of which were “shadows of good things to come.” God calls upon her to arise from the dust, that she may be enlightened, and shine by that light, which was now arrived; “for the glory of the LORD was risen upon her.” When Christ came in human nature, “the Light of the world,” “the Sun of Righteousness,” and the Glory of the Lord, arose on the church: but his bright beams have for ages been strangely obstructed, and at some times almost eclipsed, by interposing clouds: and his church has almost constantly been harassed with tribulations and persecutions; so that she has mourned as desolate, and her few witnesses have prophesied in sackcloth. (Notes, Rev. xi. 3—14.) Not only did gross darkness envelope both the Gentile world, and the land of Israel, when Christ came in the flesh: but darkness, equally intense, has covered the visible Christian church, as well as the Mohammedan and Pagan nations; and we have intimations of a still more gloomy scene, just before the Lord shall arise in his meridian brightness, most gloriously to irradiate mankind with his beams of truth and righteousness. In the primitive times the Gentiles came to this light: but we do not find, that kings did, till the light became considerably obscured: but ere long “all kings shall fall down before” the divine Saviour, and do him service. As he is “the Sun of righteousness,” and “the Light of the world,” and “the Light of the Gentiles,” he must be JEHOVAH; for “JEHOVAH shall arise” upon the church, “and his glory shall be seen upon her.”

V. 4—7. Zion is here called on to lift up her downcast eyes, to behold the blessed effects of her extraordinary irradiation. On every side converts were seen flocking to her, as her sons and daughters, from the most remote regions, to be nursed at her side, under her care and tuition, and fed upon her spiritual provisions. (Notes, xlix. 18—21. liv. 1—5. lxvi. 7—14. 19—23.) At this sight she would “overflow” with joy; her heart would be dilated with gratitude combined with reverence of God, and humble fear of acting wrong in such unexpected prosperity. (Notes, Jer. xxxiii. 6—9. Matt. xxviii. 1—8, v. 8.) For the multitudes, which dwelt in the most distant countries, separated from her by the sea, would be converted; and all their treasures, and all the wealth and power of the Gentile world, would be brought to her. This would be as surprising to the remnant of poor believers, as it would have been to the Jews, after their successive oppressions, to have seen all the kings, rulers, and grandees of Persia, Greece, Rome, and Tyre, crowding into Jerusalem with their immense revenues, in order to enlarge and beautify that holy city, and to support the worship at the temple of JEHOVAH. In order to bring such immense treasures to Jerusalem, the city must have been filled and surrounded with beasts of burden, such as the Midianites carried their merchandise upon. Thus they and the Arabians are represented, as bringing gold for tribute to Zion’s King, and incense to be used in his worship as their God; that they might shew forth his praises with all their power. (Notes, Ps. lxxii. 8—15. Hag. ii. 6—9. Matt. ii. 9—12.) All the flocks of Kedar and Nebaioth, other districts of Arabia, would be brought for acceptable sacrifices on God’s altar: and thus he would honour and beautify, more than ever, his temple, where his name had so long been glorified.—All this is evidently a figurative prediction of the purity and enlargement of the church; of the alacrity and zeal, with which different nations will dedicate themselves, and their substance, to the service of God; and of the multitude of spiritual sacrifices, which will in every place be presented to the Father with acceptance, through Christ our Temple, Altar, and great High Priest.—‘Nothing is more usual, than for the prophets to describe the state of the Christian church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple and service.’ Lowth. (Notes, lxvi. 19—23. Ez. xl. 2.)—‘It is, I think, a mark of a right understanding, in the language of prophecy, and in the design of prophecy, to keep to what appears

‘the design and meaning of the prophecy in general, and ‘what the whole of it laid together, points out to us; ‘and not to suffer a warm imagination to mislead us from ‘the real intention of the Spirit of prophecy, by follow- ‘ing uncertain applications of the parts of it.’ Lowman on the Revelation, quoted by Bp. Lowth.

V. 8, 9. The multitude of converts is here represented under another figure. The church sees immense numbers, from every quarter, thronging to her with one consent, as large flights of birds darken the air like a cloud, and as doves hasten to the windows of the dove-house: and she enquires, Who are these? To this the Lord answers, that surely the isles of the Gentiles would wait for him, to give them admission into his family: and that it would become the first use of the ships of Tarshish, which traded to the most remote regions, to bring her children, and all their wealth with them, to Zion, that they might worship the name of Zion’s God, who thus glorified her: or they would be among the first that did so. (Note, lxvi. 19—23.) This prediction will be accomplished, when Christians shall unanimously agree to make commerce and navigation subservient to the preaching of the gospel, in every country with which they trade. For the locality of the emblem, taken from the temple and worship at Jerusalem, rendered it necessary that it should be predicted in this manner; rather than as the setting up of the worship of JEHOVAH in those distant lands. The restoration of Israel, and the assistance rendered them by commercial powers, may also be predicted. (Note, xi. 11—16.)—Ships of Tarshish. (9) Notes, ii. 10—18, v. 16. 1 Kings x. 22.

V. 10—14. The imagery is here varied, but the meaning is nearly the same. The protection given to the church is represented by the building of Zion’s walls. This would be done by the sons of strangers: and kings would minister to the formerly despised church, when God, who had afflicted her in fatherly displeasure, should favour her in his mercy and peculiar favour. But as no enemies would be dreaded, her gates would not be shut, even by night; and converts would continually throng into her, and meet with free admission: so that the forces and kings of the nations would be brought into her; and those that refused this subjection would be utterly wasted and perish. As the choice timber of Lebanon beautified Solomon’s temple, that footstool of JEHOVAH; (Note, 1 Kings v. 13—18;) so shall the peculiar advantages of every nation, and of every description of men, concur to beautify the church of Christ, which he has determined to make glorious. The descendants of those nations, which have persecuted her, shall humbly submit, and supplicate her favour: yea, the very persons who have despised her, shall prostrate themselves before her, acknowledging her relation to JEHOVAH, the Holy One of Israel. (Notes, Dan. ii. 34, 35. 44, 45.)—Place of my feet. (13) Or, Foot-stool. (Marg. Ref. m.)—They shall call, &c. (14) Notes, i. 25—27. lxi. 4—6. Jer. xxxi. 23—26, v. 23. Zech. viii. 3.

V. 15—22. The language here grows still more energetic; and the images employed more grand and magnificent. Zion had been forsaken and hated, and almost universally shunned by the haughty and victorious idolaters on every side: but now nations and kings should delight to contribute, with all their ability, to her comfort and prosperity, as much as the tender mother does to suckle her beloved infant: and thus she will know that her “Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty One of

"Jacob." (Notes, xlix. 22, 23. lxi. 4—6. lxvi. 10—14.) The increase of knowledge, holiness, comfort, and prosperity, in the church, shall be so great, that it shall resemble a new building erected in the place of an old one, in which gold is used instead of brass, and silver instead of iron, &c. or, like a city, whose magistrates had been grievous oppressors, but were now become equitable and peaceable, in the greatest degree, and sought nothing but the quiet and prosperity of the publick; and whose tax-gatherers had been oppressive exactors, but were now become most just and equitable. This represents the internal peace and purity of the church, and the excellency of her rulers and teachers. (Notes, i. 25—27. lvi. 9—12.) Along with this, external peace will be connected: so that no wars, invasions, or persecutions will disturb her repose; but the very walls of Zion will be justly called "Salvation," and her gates inscribed with "praise" to her God and Protector. (Note, xxvi. 1.) The Lord himself will shine upon the church, with so glorious and enduring a light, as shall eclipse all which has heretofore been enjoyed by her, from the word and Spirit of God. And this light shall no more be withdrawn or obscured; for the days of Zion's "mourning shall then be ended;" and his heavenly light and glory, and joy on earth, shall usher in the light, glory, and joy of the eternal world. "Her people shall then be all righteous;" they shall inherit the earth as long as it endures, and heaven for ever. The church shall take root and grow, and flourish as "a branch which God hath planted;" and prosper as the work of his hands, that he may be glorified. From very small numbers and feeble beginnings, the people of God shall multiply, and become exceedingly numerous and powerful: (Notes, Dan. ii. 44, 45. Matt. xiii. 31—33:) This the Lord will hasten with all due speed, when the appointed season shall arrive.—We can conceive nothing more glorious than this description: and nothing can answer to it, but some future glorious state of the church on earth, or the state of the church triumphant in heaven. But several expressions limit our interpretation to the state of the church here below: though many bold metaphors, and sublime images, remind us how much that state will resemble heaven. (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 10—13. Rev. xx. 1—6. xxi. 1—4. 9—27. xxii. 2—5.)—Thou shalt suck, &c. (16) "Ye shall be nourished with their riches, as the child 'is with the breast. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The whole earth, from the fall of Adam to the end of time, would have been deeply covered with ignorance, error, wickedness, and misery, if the Son of God had not come a "Light into the world." (Note, John xii. 44—50.) This "Sun of righteousness" communicated much heavenly light to mankind, even long before he actually arose: but his bright beams have been diffused far more vigorously and widely, since that joyful event. Yet, after all, men in general have hitherto been greatly enveloped in gross destructive darkness; and are so at this day, wherever the light of revelation and the faithful preaching of God's word, are not afforded: nay, multitudes have the outward light, but are yet in darkness, because their eyes are blinded by Satan, through their unbelief and love of sin. (Notes, 2 Cor. iv. 3—6.) While we therefore bless our God, that this light is come unto us, we should beseech him to "shine into our hearts, to give us the light "of the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus "Christ." This mercy, when vouchsafed, is shewn us, in order that we may arise from the dust and debasement of our worldly pursuits, and "let our light shine before men," in our holy profession and conversation; that we may reflect the bright beams, with which "the LORD hath risen "upon us," that "his glory may be seen upon us," and that "men may see our good works, and glorify his name." (Notes, Matt. v. 14—16. Phil. ii. 14—18.) We should therefore "watch and be sober," and "walk as children of "the light:" and thus they, who have been strangers and enemies, will be allured to that light, which has made so excellent a change in our conduct and character. Our peaceful

CHAP. LXI.

The Messiah declares his anointing his office and

and joyous walk may be as conducive to this end, as our conscientious integrity: when Christians live up to their privileges, and enjoy much divine consolation, love sweetly constrains them to zealous obedience and close conformity to their Lord; then they appear both holy and happy, and attract the attention of others to their most excellent religion. (Note, Acts ix. 31.) As this must yield high satisfaction to the benevolent heart, it forms an additional motive to diligence, watchfulness, and fervency in prayer: and as the purity, increase, and prosperity of the church is the grand subject of these prophecies; so they ought to be of our desires, exertions, and supplications.—Ministers, and experienced Christians, should “lift up their eyes,” and look around them, for such as are setting out in the ways of God, that they may encourage, caution, and instruct them; and that the children of God may be “nourished “up in the words of sound doctrine,” under their prudent and affectionate inspection.—Our religious joys should always be tempered with reverential, humble, and cautious fear: and increasing prosperity, or an enlarged sphere of usefulness, should be rejoiced in with trembling; lest we should be lifted up in pride, or betrayed into any dishonourable conduct.—All who are truly converted to God, will dedicate their wealth and influence to him, and shew forth his praises in their use of them, and the improvement of their several talents, more or fewer, to the glory of his name. Thus it behoves every one to evidence the sincerity of his faith and love: for we shall at last be adjudged to belong to that master, in whose service we have employed our time, abilities, or substance. (Notes and P. O. Luke xvi. 1—12. Notes, Rom. vi. 16—23. 2 Cor. viii. 6—9.)—The learned, the sagacious, the ingenious, the powerful, may each contribute, in different ways, to promote the glory of God, and the peace, purity, edification, and enlargement of his church: and when this is done in simple dependence on Christ, and from love to his name, it will come up with acceptance before our God. Happy will it be for themselves, and for multitudes, when merchants shall consider the conveyance of the light of divine truth to the most distant lands, and newly discovered countries, as a primary object of their attention. Then their ships may sail more richly freighted, than if they were laden with the gold of Ophir; they may safely be committed to his care, to whose glory they are devoted; and he will surely honour those who thus honour him.—Alas! we are not at present called on to enquire, “Who are these, that “fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?” Few, in comparison with the numbers of our land, will attend on the faithful preaching of the gospel: but much fewer make the name of the Lord their Refuge, and their Resting-place. Yet let us be thankful, that there is a remnant, and hope and pray for better times: and let us see to ourselves, that the ordinances of God be to our souls, as the house and the nest to the timorous dove.—It is a great honour and favour to us “sons of strangers,” that we may be allowed, in any humble sphere, to build the walls of Zion: and it is a high privilege for kings to minister to that cause, for which “the King of kings” shed his precious blood. He, in whose hand are the hearts of kings, can easily bring them all to minister to his church, without deviating in the least from the line of their peculiar duty and station: (Note, 2 Chr. xxx. 12:) and he will do it in his due time; for, though he has in his anger smitten her, he has manifold mercies and favours in reserve for her.—Blessed be his name, the gates of Zion are ever open to receive returning sinners, who come with the desire of their hearts to be enrolled as her citizens: the prayer of humble faith, to Zion’s God and King, can never be unseasonable, night or day; and every true convert is an accession to the strength, beauty, and honour of our holy city, at which angels in heaven rejoice. (Note, Luke xv. 8—10.) Thus from every quarter some do, and more shortly will, come to beautify the sanctuary of God; and by them he “will glorify the house of his glory.”—The children of persecutors, and even persecutors themselves, are welcomed to all the privileges of Zion’s citizens; when they are humbled for their sins, and disposed to honour her, and join themselves to her, as “the city of the Holy “One of Israel.”

V. 15—22.

The believer is often for a long time, afflicted, hated, and apparently deserted; yet the Lord will at length make him eternally excellent and happy.—Those who attend duly to the truths, precepts, and ordinances of scriptural Christianity, have long been “filled with the contempt of the “scornful,” and have been reviled or hated by the wise, the learned, and the powerful of the earth; so that the cross to be endured has made men averse to be connected with them: yet this very company shall be made “an “eternal excellency, a joy of many generations;” and powerful kings and nations shall rejoice to promote their comfort and prosperity, and to serve their interest with their whole heart, soul, and strength; knowing that “their “Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty God of “Jacob.” If then, in those happy days, when “for brass “the LORD will bring gold, and for iron, silver, &c.” all the officers of the nations and of the church shall be peace and their exactors righteousness: how should Christian magistrates, rulers, civil and ecclesiastical, and teachers aim now to be patrons and examples of peace and righteousness! And how should all Christian kings endeavour to terminate the effusion of human blood, and to avoid all violence, wasting, and destruction! For in those days men will be Christians indeed; and every one will do that and no more than that, which is equally the duty of all, in this and every age, and from the neglect of which all our miseries arise. The people shall then be filled with knowledge, truth, and grace; they “shall all be righteous,” “the branch of God’s planting, the work of his hand “that he may be glorified;” (Notes, xix. 23—25. lxi. 1—3. Ps. xcii. 13—15;) and this will render earth almost like heaven. But if the church may, and shall in due season be thus illuminated, sanctified, and enlarged, and prospered with such permanent joy and peace; if her “walls may here “be called Salvation, and her gates Praise; if she may be said to have done with mourning, even in this land of sorrow and death; what will the glory and happiness of heaven be, where “the LORD himself w

NOTES.

CHAP. LXI. V. 1—3. The prophet, having declared in general both the troubles and deliverances of the church to the end of time, here returns to state some particulars more fully, which relate to those great events. This chapter refers to the coming of Christ, and the calling of the Gentiles. The allusions may be taken from the release of the captive Jews, and their return to their cities and lands: but Christ himself has determined the interpretation to more spiritual and evangelical subjects. (Note, Luke iv. 6—19.) The Messiah himself is here introduced as the speaker: and these first verses relate to his personal ministry, and the general tendency and effect of his gospel. “The Spirit of the LORD” rested on him to anoint, consecrate, and qualify him, as Man, for the work to which he was appointed. (Notes, xi. 1—5. xlii. 1—4. lix. 20, 21. Matt. iii. 16, 17. John iii. 27—36, v. 34. Acts i. 1—3. x. 6—43, v. 38.) By virtue of his voluntary obedience and sacrifice, as our Surety and High Priest, he was authorized to preach the glad tidings of forgiveness, and free salvation, to the meek, the afflicted, “the poor in spirit,” the penitent, who know their guilt, danger, and misery: for though the Gospel is proposed to all, yet it does not appear glad tidings to any but the convinced, humbled sinner. (Notes, lvii. 15, 16. Matt. v. 3.) He was also commissioned effectually to bind up and heal the broken-hearted; to proclaim liberty to the slaves and captives of Satan and sin, and effectually to free them from the bondage of their sins, evil habits, and strong temptations. Thus he would announce the year of jubilee, “the acceptable year of the LORD,” the time of his especial grace, when he would pardon sins, remit debts, restore forfeited inheritances, receive offenders to full favour, and grant all requests and petitions. (Notes and P. O. Lev. xxv. 8—55. Notes, Jer. xiv. 8—17.) But this would be connected with the day of his vengeance on those, who opposed or “neglected” so great salvation.” (Notes, Matt. iii. 7—10. xxiii. 54—

36. Luke xxi. 20—24, v. 22. 1 Thes. ii. 13—16, vv. 15, 16. Heb. ii. 1—4. x. 28—31. xii. 22—25.) This seems especially to predict the respite granted to the Jewish nation, from the coming of Christ to the vengeance executed on them by the Romans. (Note, Luke xxi. 20—24.) Yet this day of vengeance did not in the least interfere with his commission, to “comfort all, who mourned” for sin, or in a gracious manner under their afflictions. (Note, Matt. v. 4.) He came to appoint gladness to all Zion’s mourners, to give those, who lay self-abased before God, as in sackcloth and ashes, the joy of acceptance and the beauty of holiness; to exchange their mourning and dejection for the consolations of the Holy Spirit, and for those garments of praise, which were used on festive occasions. And that, (adopting another figure,) they might be planted, watered, and made to grow vigorously, as “trees of righteousness,” in the courts of the Lord, being the planting of his hand, and bearing fruit to his glory.—The reader need only advert to the encouragement which Christ gave to the humble and broken-hearted publicans and sinners, in his personal ministry; and to the severity, which he shewed to proud Sadducees and Pharisees, to see the force of these expressions, and the genuine nature and tendency of his Gospel.—It is observable that our Lord, in applying this passage to his own ministry, omitted the words, “the day of vengeance of our God;” no doubt, because he would not, at the first address, say any thing needlessly to offend his countrymen. (Notes, Luke iv. 16—22.) The Septuagint render the clause here translated, “the opening of the prison to them that are bound;” (1) “the recovering of sight to the blind;” and thus it is quoted by St. Luke. (Luke iv. 18.—Notes, xxxv. 5—7. xlii. 13—17, v. 16. Acts xxvi. 16—18, v. 18.)

Trees of righteousness. (3) “Trees approved.” Heb. ‘Oaks of righteousness:’... that is, such as by their flourishing condition, should shew, that they were “the cion of God’s planting, and the work of his hands;”... ‘that is,’ says Vitringa... ‘commendable for the strength of their faith, their durability, and firmness.’ Bp. Lowth. (Notes, lx. 15—22, v. 21. John xv. 1—8.)

V. 4—6. Zerubbabel, Joshua the high priest, Nehemiah, and others, rebuilt Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, after the captivity; and some think, that this passage predicts the return of the converted Jews to their own land, alien shall be your plowmen, and your vine-dressers.

8 For ^x I the LORD love judgment, ^y I hate robbery for burnt-offering; and ^z I will direct their work in truth, and ^a I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

and settling again in it: (Notes, Ezra iii—vi. Neh. iii. Hag. i. ii. Zech. i—vi.) but it seems rather, from the context, to be a figurative description of the happy effects produced by the preaching of the gospel in the primitive times. Spiritual worship and true holiness had been at a very low ebb for some ages, when our Lord entered on his ministry. Those “blind guides,” the Scribes and Pharisees, had made “void the commandments of God by “their traditions” and interpretations. The Sadducees also, by their infidel principles, had increased these desolations. But the apostles and primitive evangelists, having been humbled, comforted, and sanctified, by our Lord’s ministry, and by the pouring out of his Spirit, were employed to build up what was decayed and gone to ruins. By the blessing of God on their labours, “many tens of “thousands,” among the Jews, became humble disciples of Christ, and spiritual worshippers of God through him. And by the conversion of the Gentiles, the church was replenished with multitudes of believers, immensely greater than had ever been known, even before “the desolations “of many generations.” Thus Zion was built up, and her desolated cities rose from their ruins; according to the figurative language often used even in the New Testament. (Notes, xlix. 7, 8. lviii. 8—12. 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Eph. ii. 19—22.)—The strangers and aliens, thus brought into the church, were not only useful to the apostles, evangelists, and Jewish converts, by “their temporal things” and outward services, to which the language next used seems restricted: (Notes, lx. 4—14. lxvi. 10—14:) but they were ordained as elders over the churches planted by the apostles and evangelists; and thus, in a spiritual sense, fed their flocks, and became their plowmen and vine-dressers; that is, they were stated pastors over the sheep of Christ, and labourers in his husbandry and vineyard.—Yet some peculiar distinctions were reserved to the Jewish converts. All the apostles, and all the writers of the New Testament, were of that nation, unless Luke were an exception, as it is probable he was. (Preface to Luke.) The first pastors and ministers from among the Gentiles, were ordained to that office, by the apostles and Jewish evangelists, and were under their immediate superintendency. This distinction might be figuratively alluded to, when it was said, “Ye shall be named the priests of the LORD; men shall “call you the ministers of our God.” The priests of Aaron’s line were set aside; and the apostles and evangelists succeeded to as much of their office and authority, as accorded to the nature of the Christian dispensation. But perhaps the verse, in general, means that all true Christians would be more honoured, and admitted nearer to God, than the priests and Levites among the Jews. (Marg. Ref. q.)—Thus the riches of the Gentiles were brought into the church, and the poor converts of the Jews possessed the substance of all, in which these had gloried; whilst the Gentiles were admitted to share their spiritual things. Yet the Jews had some ground of triumph and exultation, when their despisers and enemies joined with them in the worship of JEHOVAH, and in receiving and submitting to the Messiah, who had been predicted by their prophets, and had arisen of their nation, and been made known to them by their teachers. (Notes, Jer. xvi. 19—21. Zech. viii. 20—23.)

The desolations of many generations. (4) ‘If we suppose the Jews, after their conversion to return into their ‘own land ..., we may fitly explain this text, of their re-‘edifying their ancient habitations. Lowth. This, however, does not appear to be the direct subject of the prophecy.

V. 7—9. These verses may predict in general the extensive and permanent success of the Gospel in the world. Instead of that contempt, which the worshippers of JEHOVAH had experienced from their neighbours, they would receive a double portion of honour and respect, from the Gentile converts to Christianity: (Note, lx. 15—22, v. 15:) Believers and preachers of the Jewish nation would be peculiarly regarded even in those lands, where they had formerly met with injury and ignominy; and this joyful change would endure to the end, and for ever. As “the Lord “loveth judgment, and hates robbery” and injustice, even when varnished over with a profession of godliness, and especially when the gains are impiously consecrated to his worship as if he were a sharer in the robbery; (Notes Prov. xxi. 27. Jer. vii. 8—11;) so he had determined to reject the hypocritical Jewish nation, and to replenish his church with believers from among the Gentiles. He would “direct the works” of his people and ministers in truth and uprightness, and make a new covenant with them which should endure to the end; and their believing posterity, from age to age, should be known and acknowledged among the nations, as a holy people, happy in the favour of God, and sanctified by his grace. (Notes, xxv. 12—18. xliii. 22—25. xlv. 3—5. lxv. 21—23. Deut. xx. 1—10. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. xxxii. 39—41. Ez. xi. 17—20. xxxvi. 25—27. Zech. xii. 9—14.)

Ye shall have double. (7) ‘An allusion to God’s blessing Job after his afflictions, when he gave him double ‘what he had before. (Job. xlii. 10. Comp. Zech. ix. 12.) ‘As the first born had a double share in his father’s estate; (Deut. xxi. 17;) so the Jews, when converted

' the Christian faith, will recover their birth-right, which they had forfeited by their infidelity, as Esau did, and be esteemed as the first-born, or elder brethren in the church ' of God.' Lowth. The apostle and Jewish converts to Christianity had this birth-right or precedency, in the primitive times: and indeed the scriptures, almost all written by Israelites, and in every age received by Christians of all nations as "the oracles of God," give this double honour to them. The restoration also of the converted Jews to their own land, where they shall permanently enjoy their double, seems to be predicted.—"Ye shall inherit the land the second time." Sept.

I will direct, &c. (8) "I will give them the reward of their work with faithfulness." Bp. Lowth. This translation does not well accord to the context, or the language of coincident prophecies.—"I will give them grace to serve me in spirit and in truth." Lowth.

V. 13—11. The church here answers to those gracious assurances, which had been given her, declaring that she greatly and inwardly rejoiced in the LORD her God, and anticipated the glorious times which had been predicted. For he had arrayed her with his salvation and righteousness, as her covering and ornament, in order to her espousals to himself; for which he thus made preparation, as the bridegroom was used to deck himself with ornaments, and the bride to adorn herself with the jewels presented to her. (Notes, 1—3. lii. 1. Ps. cxxxii. 7—9. Luke xv. 22—24. Rom. iii. 21—26, v. 22. Gal. iii. 26—29.) And she expressed the fullest assurance, that as the earth, or even as the well-cultivated garden, yields an increase of the seed sown in it, so surely would the LORD cause righteousness for his people, and praise and glory for himself, to spring forth before all the nations of the earth. (Notes, lv. 10, 11. Ps. lxxxv. 10—13. Mark iv. 26—29.)—The word rendered "ornaments" is supposed to mean a crown like those worn by the priests; indeed the whole alludes to the "garments for glory and beauty," worn by the high priest, and the white linen worn by all the priests. The word rendered decketh himself, properly signifies a priest's habiting himself with the ornaments proper for his office: (Notes, Ex. xxviii. 2. 40, 41. xxix. 1—7. Rev. xix. 7, 8:) and this language is peculiarly applicable to the case of Christians; who, adorned with the robe of righteousness, conferred on them by their great High Priest, are through him "made kings and priests to our God." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Zech. iii. 1—7. 1 Pet. iii. 4—6. Rev. i. 4—6. v. 8—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—6.

The office of the great Redeemer, and the tenour of his gospel, are peculiarly encouraging to the humble and teachable, to those who are burdened with a guilty conscience, and fears of deserved wrath; and who are distressed, through the power of inbred sins and strong temptations. Let such discouraged souls then attend to the voice of Christ; for he was "anointed and sent to bind up the broken heart," to pardon the self-condemned, to break off the fetters from the enslaved, to break open the prison door, and to give "liberty to the captives." But large as his commission is, the proud, impenitent, and stout-hearted, continuing such, exclude themselves from the benefit of it; for, unless they are brought by the holy law, the ministration of death and condemnation to transgressors, and by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, to know themselves, and humbly submit to God; they will neither understand the nature of the blessings conferred by him, "who came to seek and save that which was lost;" nor at all desire them.—Whilst the gospel is preached to us, "the acceptable year of the LORD continues:" let then such, as have feared to know the worst of themselves, recollect that if they be but humbled and rendered contrite in heart, and "submit to the righteousness of God," Christ will assuredly relieve and comfort them: but let the careless, the infidel, the profligate, the hypocritical, take notice, that "the day of vengeance of our God" is intimately connected with his "acceptable year." Let none delay; for their limited time of mercy and grace may soon expire: let none despond, who are mourning before God in deep self-abasement; for the gracious Saviour will surely comfort them, and render them both joyful and holy: but let none rest in false joy and carnal confidence; for the rejoicing of every true penitent is connected with love and praise; and they are made "trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he may be glorified."—God is pleased, from age to age, to employ those, who have been thus convinced, humbled, pardoned, and sanctified by his grace, to execute "the ministry of reconciliation" between him and their fellow-sinners. (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 17—21. vi. 1, 2.) They too are sent to comfort the mourners, and to bind up the broken-hearted, and to copy the example, as well as to proclaim the gospel, of their Lord and Saviour. He even employs such persons as instruments of extensive usefulness to his church: and thus we poor sinners of the Gentiles, are honoured to be "workers together with God," for the good of his redeemed people. But we should desire the good and useful, though laborious work of the ministry, more than the honour of being "named the priests of the LORD," or than the emolument of "eating the riches of the Gentiles." Indeed all believers may glory in being "the priests of the LORD," separated and consecrated to offer him spiritual sacrifices, and to draw near to him: but let none boast themselves in this glory, or even affect to glory in God on this account, who

V. 7—11.

True believers will at length be doubly honoured for all their confusion and self-abasement before God, and for all the shame and disgrace which they have suffered from the world; and those who have most despised them, will behold them, (perhaps from afar,) rejoicing in their portion with everlasting joy.—The just and heart-searching God cannot be imposed upon by specious hypocrites; or be induced to accept the most costly oblations from those, who would thus make atonements for their injustice: and large donations to pious and charitable uses must be honestly obtained, in order to be accepted of him; or, restitution must first be made to those who have been defrauded. (Note and P. O. Luke xix. 1—10, v. 8.) But he will not reject the feeblest attempt of the upright believer: he will direct him and his works, in the way of his precepts and promises, and teach him how to perform his well-meant services acceptably; and he will ratify and seal unto him his everlasting covenant. This chosen generation continues as “a peculiar people” distinguished by their piety, and zeal for good works, as well as for their joy and confidence in God; and all who impartially observe them may perceive, and should acknowledge, “that they are a seed which the LORD hath blessed.” They may also cheerfully expect that their offspring, which they dedicate to him, and bring up for him, shall inherit the same blessings, and be distinguished in the same manner. Every one of them may therefore rejoice greatly in the LORD his God, who “hath clothed him with the garments of salvation,” even the robe of the Redeemer's righteousness; and admitted him to a union and relation to him, of which the most endeared relations on earth are feeble shadows; and which death, that dissolves all our other unions, shall eternally perfect. (Notes, 1 Pet. i. 23—25.) Let us seek first these blessings, rejoice in them, and aim to walk worthy of them: and let us gladly anticipate the time, when “righteousness and praise shall spring forth before all the nations” of the earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXII. V. 1—5. Some commentators suppose that the prophet here speaks in his own name, and in that of the prophets and ministers of God in successive generations: but he seems to have spoken, as the type of Christ, and in his name. We may, therefore, consider the Son of God, assuring the church of his unfailing love and care of her, and of his intercession for her, under all trials and difficulties; and that he would never intermit his prevailing pleas, and powerful interpositions, in her behalf, till “her righteousness” and her “salvation shone” forth with the brightness of a lamp, lighted up and burning in a conspicuous place, for the use of all that were near unto it.—(Notes, xlii. 12, 13. li. 4—8. lx. 1—3. lxi. 10, 11.) By Zion's “righteousness” we may understand, either the righteousness by which believers are justified, or the fruits of righteousness by which that justification is evidenced: and her “salvation” may mean the doctrine of salvation taught in the church; or the blessings enjoyed by believers, as the first fruits of eternal salvation. These would at length be rendered so abundant and conspicuous, that “the Gentiles,” yea, “all kings would behold her glory” in them; and so Zion would be called by a new name, which the Lord would give her. Some understand this of the name of Christians, by which believers are called under the new dispensation: (Notes, lxxv. 13—15. Acts xi. 25, 26:) but perhaps it refers to that change, which was about to take place in their state, which is signified by the names afterwards mentioned. Then the church would become a crown, or diadem, which God would hold in his hand, to shew his delight in thus honouring her; and her peace, holiness, and happiness would be held forth, to allure others to come, and seek a share of her blessings. She would no longer be looked upon, and spoken of, as a “forsaken” or divorced woman, nor “her land as left desolate,” as Judah had been during the captivity: but the Lord would honour her by the name of “Hephzi-bah,” or, My delight is in her: (Note, 2 Kings xxi. 1, 2:) and her land, or the countries occupied by his people, would be called “Beulah,” or Married: for the Lord would as openly avow his special favour to his church, as a man does for her whom he publicly espouses. (Notes, liv. 4—10. lxi. 10, 11. Hos. ii. 18—20. Eph. v. 22—27.) Indeed “as a young man marrieth a virgin,” whom he greatly loves, so would Zion’s Restorer marry her, and God would rejoice in his love to her, as the bridegroom over his bride. The word rendered “thy sons” may be translated “thy restorer,” by altering some of the vowel-points; or rather, “thy restorers;” for the verb is plural. (Note, xlix. 17.) But, perhaps, even this is not necessary. The church is sometimes spoken of as a matron, or as a widow, or a divorced woman, and then again as a virgin: so that it would not be unprecedented, if the members of the church should sometimes be considered as her dutiful sons; and at others, as standing in the relation of a husband to her. Such variations of images must sometimes occur in a style so exceedingly figurative and highly poetical, (according to the bold genius of eastern poetry,) as that of Isaiah.—The conversion of Constantine, and the prosperity and peace of the Christian church, after the continued persecutions which she had endured, are supposed by some to be here predicted: and yet the language seems to indicate that far more glorious events are intended: and indeed in its most obvious meaning, it predicts the restoration, and honour, and felicity of Israel, as a nation.—A new name. V. 6, 7. There is no intimation of any change in the speaker; and if we consider the former verses as the words of the Messiah, these verses are the continuance of his discourse.—“The word shomerim,” (translated watchmen,) doth properly signify those priests and Levites, who kept watch day and night about the temple, and some of them at certain hours sung psalms of prayer and praise. Lowth. (Notes, Ps. cxxxiv. 1—3. cxxxv. 1, 2.) An allusion may be made to this custom: but “the walls of Jerusalem,” not the courts of the temple, would be thus guarded: and the watchmen, on Zion’s walls, evidently mean the prophets and faithful ministers of Christ, who are employed to give warning of the approach of an enemy, and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness.

These watchmen would be instant in preaching the word, and constant in prayer for the prosperity of the church; and all believers are expected to join with them. These “make mention of the LORD,” or rather are “his remembrancers,” (marg.) to remind him of his promises: and they are exhorted not to take rest, nor to give him rest; but importunately to beseech him to perform his word; till he shall establish his church, in righteousness, peace, and truth, and render her the praise and glory of the whole earth. (Note, lxi. 10, 11.)—This assuredly is addressed to us also, however we interpret the prophecy. To us likewise it is said, “Let there be no silence to you; and allow no silence to him until, &c.” according to the emphatical language of the original. ‘He exhorteth the ministers never to cease to call on God ... for the deliverance of his church, and to teach others to do the same.’ (Note, Luke xviii. 1—8, vv. 7, 8.)

V. 8, 9. The Lord is here said to have “sworn by his right hand, and the Arm of his strength;” (Note, liii. 1;) or to have pledged the honour of his omnipotence, that he will rescue his church from her enemies. The images are taken from the devastations which were made in Judah, when the enemies of the Jews seized their corn and wine: but when the invaders were vanquished, then the Jews reaped their harvest and vintage, and feasted upon part of them in the courts of the temple, whither they carried their peace-offerings, first-fruits, and other oblations. (Notes, lxx. 21—23. Lev. xix. 23—25. Deut. xii. 5—18. xiv. 22—29. Zech. ix. 13—17.) This implies the deliverance of the Christian church from those persecutors, who have often kept from them the word of God, and deprived them of the labours of their ministers, by putting them to death, immuring them in prisons, or driving them into foreign countries. But a blessed change is here predicted, which would be welcomed and improved in a holy and thankful manner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—12. The friends and ministers of the church are here peremptorily commanded, or most earnestly exhorted, to go through her gates, to cast up a highway, and to remove every obstruction, that the people might come to Zion from the ends of the earth ; and to lift up a standard to give them notice, that the time was arrived. (Notes, xl. 3—5. lvii. 14.) For the proclamation was sent forth to the ends of the earth, that Zion's "Salvation," or rather Saviour, was come. "Lo, thy Saviour cometh." Bp. Lowth. (Notes, xl. 9—11. Zech. ix. 9, 10.)—The Lord Jesus was about to receive his full recompence, in becoming "the Salvation of God to the ends of the earth," and to perform that great work which is before him : (Note, xlix. 5, 6 :) and thenceforth the church would be called, "A holy people, the redeemed of the LORD:" being "sought out" or greatly desired by him in her afflictions, and assured of being no more forsaken.—Many events have been partial accomplishments of this prediction, especially that before-mentioned : but I apprehend these were only earnest of more glorious times which are yet to come. The restoration of the converted Jews and Israelites to their own land does not seem to be exclusively intended, as some expositors think : but rather the general prevalence of religion, throughout the world, is predicted in figurative language ; of which that restoration will form a most conspicuous part, and introductory to all that still remains to be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

We ought to be much encouraged, by firmly believing the unchangeable love of Christ to his church, and his uninterrupted intercession in her behalf, in which he will steadily persevere, till her righteousness and salvation are rendered most conspicuous and glorious : and we should in our several stations, and the due improvement of all our talents, imitate his example. The interests of true religion should be near our hearts, and we ought to be willing "to spend and be spent in promoting them," without seeking our own credit or emolument ; and be unwearied in doing good, waiting for our rest in heaven. We must think nothing done, while so much remains undone ; and we ought to expect and pray for greater, and still far greater success, by every degree which is vouchsafed us. Our first object should be to promote the purity of the church, in doctrine and practice, and her internal peace and unity : for when the gospel of salvation, through the righteousness of Christ and by the sanctification of the Spirit, are clearly professed, and solidly preached and vindicated ; and when the holy lives and mutual love of those, who profess and preach this salvation, "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things:" then "the righteousness of Zion shines forth, as a lamp that burneth ;" and her brightness makes way for the wider diffusion of divine knowledge.—But her glory and excellency must become very conspicuous, before all kings and nations can behold it : and therefore zealous endeavours to increase knowledge, holiness, and union among professed Christians, over his enemies and vengeance on them, 1—5. A thankful commemoration of God's ancient mercies to Israel, 7—14. A prayer for the return of his mercy to them, 15—19.

tend as much to bring forward the great triumphs of the Gospel, as promoting missions into the remote and benighted regions of the earth ; and both should be attempted with active and steady perseverance.—When the scandals of the church shall be removed, and her breaches healed, she will appear as "the perfection of beauty," and be "called by a new name:" and all that behold her excellency and felicity, and the special favour of God to her, will find their hearts allured to seek a share in her privileges.—Whilst we admire the happiness of the church, (constituted of redeemed sinners, yea, reconciled enemies,) in being the object of the Lord's "delight," and as "married" unto him ; let us also adore his infinite condescension and love. We may all aspire to these honours ; and, coming in the name of Christ, we shall not be refused or forsaken : but we should well consider the reciprocal duties, which result from such high relations and obligations ; that we may thence deduce motives to faithfulness, obedience, submission, and the most entire and devoted attachment. If God rejoice over us and over his church, "as a bridegroom rejoiceth over his bride ;" surely we should rejoice in his favour and service, and desire no other happiness : and, as the true sons of the church, we should heartily espouse her interests, and seek her peace and prosperity. Some the Lord employs as watchmen to defend the walls of Zion : let us then be watchful and faithful, instant in preaching, fervent in prayer, patient in enduring hardship, wholly giving ourselves to the work of the ministry. Others are with them "the Lord's remembrancers:" let these recollect, that he loves to be reminded of his promises and predictions ; that he delights in their importunity ; and that he commands them "not to keep silence, and to give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."

V. 8—12.

We should thankfully acknowledge, that the Lord has already, in a considerable degree, fulfilled the engagements which he in such a solemn manner entered into with his ancient servants. He has founded a church, to the honour of his name, in this our most remote part of the world ; and at present, he preserves it from oppression and persecution : he no longer suffers our adversaries to lock up from us, in an unknown language, the holy scriptures, which are as food and cordials for our souls ; or to pervert them to their own base purposes. We have the full comfort and benefit of publick ordinances, of the labours of his ministers, and of every means of edification. Let us be thankful for these mercies, and for all our distinguished temporal advantages, and use them all in a holy manner. Let us delight in attending on his courts, that we may enjoy the consolations of his Spirit : and let us remember that his almighty arm is engaged to effect all that yet remains to be done ; and that he has confirmed it with an oath, for our fuller assurance. Let us also endeavour by our examples, prayers, and improvement of our talents, to open Zion's gates, to prepare her ways, to remove obstructions, to forward the

And we are sure that he will never forsake one, whom he has redeemed and sanctified; and that the cause which he favours will surely prevail.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXIII. V. 1—6. These verses contain a prophetic representation of the victories of Christ over the enemies of his church: for of him the passage must be interpreted, nor can so much as an accommodation of it to any other be admitted. But it is remarkable, that many have understood it of the sufferings of Christ, and of his being covered with his own blood: though nothing can be more evident, than that he is represented by the prophet, as covered with the blood of his enemies, and as a mighty Conqueror and Avenger; and not as a Lamb slain for a sacrifice. Whoever considers attentively what has been proposed on a parallel scripture, (Notes, xxxiv.) will probably be convinced that Edom, and Bozrah the chief city of Edom, are here to be understood mystically: that the destruction of the chief city of the antichristian powers, and of all that pertinaciously adhere to that cause, are here predicted: and that no other events fully answer to the description; though the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and that of the Roman Emperors and armies, about the time of Constantine's advancement to the imperial throne, have been mentioned as a partial accomplishment of it. 'Though this prophecy must have its accomplishment, there is no necessity of supposing that it has been already accomplished. There are prophecies, which intimate a great slaughter of the enemies of God and his people, which remain to be fulfilled: these, in Ezekiel, chap. xxxviii, and in the Revelation of St. John, chap. xx, are called Gog and Magog.—This prophecy of Isaiah may possibly refer to the same, or the like event.' Bp. Lowth. (Notes, xxv. 10—12. Num. xxiv. 23, 24. Ps.

To this, Messiah answers, that it is He, the Judge, who gives sentence in righteousness against his enemies, performs all his promises, and is mighty to save his church.—The prophet again enquires, wherefore his apparel was discoloured, and why he appeared like one, that had been treading the purple grapes in the wine-press. To which Messiah answers, that he had been treading the wine-press of the wrath of God; that by his own power, without any human help, he had crushed his obstinate opposers; and that he would thus trample upon them all, in his fury and indignation; and would account their blood, staining his garments, as honourable to his justice, truth, and power: for the day of vengeance was in his heart, or was determined on, as pleasing to him; being the appointed season of rescuing his church of redeemed sinners from oppression. (Notes, xxxiv. 8. lxi. 1—3, v. 2.) He had indeed looked for some to stand forth to protect his people and uphold his cause, and he marvelled that there was none: therefore his own arm effected the salvation decreed and predicted; his hot displeasure sustained him in taking vengeance on his enemies; and this was but an earnest of the full end, which he would make of all who opposed him and his cause. (Notes, lix. 16—19. Zech. viii. 2.)—The event alone can determine the precise meaning of several expressions in these prophecies; the enemies to be destroyed; and the nature and extent of the deliverance and triumphs of Israel, which is certainly implied; though not, in my view at least, exclusively predicted.—'Things were come to that extremity, that there was no appearance of succour by any human means. Those, who by their office and character ought to have stood up in defence of oppressed

V. 9. The Lord interested himself in all the afflictions of Israel, even as if he had shared in their sufferings: (Notes, Judg. x. 15, 16 Heb. ii. 16—18. iv. 14—16:) and the only begotten Son of the Father became the Angel, or Messenger, of his love, in and by whom his special presence attended them for their preservation and salvation, not only from Egypt to Canaan, but also through their successive generations: and thus he compassionately redeemed and bare them, with the patience, assiduity, and tenderness, with which a nursing mother carries and tends her beloved infant. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Angel of his covenant, (who still appears before his face to intercede for his church,) saved them.' Bp. Hall. 'The Hebrew ... text reads lo with an aleph, which signifies not: and the margin reads lo with a vau, which signifies him: our translation follows the marginal reading, the Septuagint that of the text; and joining the latter part of the eighth verse with the ninth, translate the whole period very agreeably to the present Hebrew text thus: 'He was their Saviour out of all their trouble. It was not a messenger, nor an angel, but himself delivered them.'—The Angel, who conducted them by the pillar of fire and cloud, was no other than the Logos, or second Person of the blessed Trinity. ... The Person, who led the people through the wilderness, could be no created being; though he is sometimes called an Angel, because he took on him the office and ministry of angels, as he afterwards "took upon him the form of a servant." V. 10. Israel was rebellious from their leaving Egypt though all the ages, during which they continued the professed people of God: they provoked him by their murmurs, idolatries, and multiplied crimes: they resisted and vexed, or provoked, his Holy Spirit, by idolatry, impiety, hypocrisy, and iniquity, by despising and persecuting his prophets; and especially by rejecting and crucifying their promised Messiah; and opposing the gospel, when preached by the apostles, "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," to attest their doctrine by his miraculous operations: thus, God, who had before been their Friend and fought for them, became their dreadful enemy and fought against them, by the Romans, to the destruction of their city; and since that time, by various instruments even to this present day. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Neh. ix. 15—30 Ps. xcv. 9—11. cvi. 12—38. Ex. vi. 8—10. xx. 15—32 Dan. ix. 5—13. Acts vii. 51—53.)

'truth and innocence, even they... betrayed so good a cause, or had not the courage to defend it. ... lix. 16.—"I have trodden down the people in my anger;" this agrees better with the context: God's judgments are often represented by a cup of intoxicating liquor: because they astonish men, and bereave them of their usual discretion.' V. 7, 8. It has been observed, that it is probable the destruction of every antichristian power will make way for the conversion of the Jews: and it is very reasonably concluded by the most eminent interpreters, that the subsequent part of this chapter and the whole of the next, are intended as a kind of directory to their prayers on that occasion.—'The remaining part of this chapter, with the whole chapter following, contains a penitential confession and supplication of the Israelites, in their present state of dispersion, in which they so long marvellously subsisted, and still continue to subsist, as a people; cast out of their country; without any proper form of civil polity, or religious worship; their temple destroyed, their city desolated and lost to them; apparently deserted and cast off by the God of their fathers, as no longer his peculiar people. They begin with acknowledging God's great mercies and favours to their nation; and the ungrateful returns made to them on their part; that by their disobedience they had forfeited the protection of God, and had caused him to become their adversary. And now the prophet represents them as addressing their humble supplication for the renewal of his mercies: ... they confess their wickedness and hardness of heart; they intreat his forgiveness. ... It seems designed as a formulary of humiliation for the Israelites, in order to their conversion.'

Bp. Lowth.—The prophet, or the nation as represented by him, determines to mention, or call to remembrance, the peculiar favours of God to Israel, from his exuberant love and mercy, as worthy of their most fervent praises and thanksgivings. When they solemnly acceded to the covenant proposed to them at mount Sinai, the Lord proceeded to deal with them as his people and children; as if he had been assured that they would not lie or prevaricate in so solemn an agreement, or deal deceitfully with him. This is spoken after the manner of men, and implies that he had given them no cause for their falsehood and apostasy.

V. 11—14. It is not agreed, whether God, or the nation of Israel, be spoken of in the beginning of this passage: but it is most obvious to understand it of the Jews, in their rejected condition, calling to remembrance JEHOVAH's ancient mercies to their forefathers, and again enquiring after him. Some of that people, being made sensible of the wrath of God against them, and reflecting how his power had been exercised in behalf of their fathers, and what promises had been made to them, begin seriously to enquire, 'Where is He, who shewed such wonders of power and love to Moses and his people?' Where is the LORD, who brought Israel up out of the Red sea, with Moses and Aaron, to whom he had committed them, as a flock to the care of a shepherd, but who could not have delivered either themselves or the people? (Notes, li. 9—11. 2 Kings ii. 14. Ps. lxxvii. 14—20.) Where is He, who put his Holy Spirit upon the seventy Elders, to enable them to assist Moses in his too arduous work? (Notes, Num. xi. 11—30. Hag. ii. 3—5, v. 5;) who led the multitudes of Israel through the deep channel of the Red Sea, (the waters of which he divided by his power, for the glory of his name,) with as much safety and as little obstruction, as a horse passeth in the open plains; and who afterwards guided them through the wilderness to the rest and plenty of Canaan, as the beast goeth down, after the labour of the day, to feed and lie down in the fruitful valley? (Marg. Ref. m, n.) And would this mighty God of Jacob no more glorify his name, in delivering his ancient people from their calamities? (Notes, 15—19. Ps. lxxvii. 5—12. xxxix. 38—48. xc. 13—17.)

V. 15—19. The preceding meditations are represented, as exciting the hopes and fears of penitent Israel; and here are words prepared for them to take with them, in returning unto the Lord. (Note, Hos. xiv. 1—3.) They are therefore introduced, as beseeching him to "look down" "from the habitation of his holiness and of his glory," on the abject condition of their once favoured nation. They enquire, "Where is his zeal for his own glory," his power heretofore exerted in their favour, and his tender compassions for them in their troubles? Were they for ever restrained? (Note, 11—14.) They plead, that even if Abraham and Israel should disown them, or know nothing of them, or could afford them no help in their misery; yet doubtless he would remember his relation to them, and be their Father and Redeemer; (Note, Deut. xxxii. 6;) for his name, (his perfections,) was everlasting and unchangeable. Why then had he so long left the nation to be judicially hardened and blinded, estranged from his fear, and given up to error, unbelief, and obstinacy? (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, vi. 9, 10. xlv. 18—20.) Would it not be more glorious to his name to remove the veil from the hearts of his chosen inheritance, to return to their tribes, and to remember his ancient servants, the fathers of their nation?—We suppose a remnant of the Jews to plead thus in behalf of their unbelieving brethren. And they further urge, that the people, whom God had separated from the nations to be his holy worshippers, had possessed the promised land comparatively for a very short season; and their adversaries had long trodden down their holy city and temple. Yet they were still his people, "beloved for their fathers' sake:" whereas the Romans, who destroyed the city and temple, and the nations which have since trodden them down, were never subject to him or called by his name. (Note, Rom. xi. 25—32.)—From the entrance of Israel, under Joshua, into the promised land, to the captivity and dispersion of the ten tribes, was 730 years; and to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersion of the Jews, not so much as 1500 years; whereas above

2500 years have passed since the dispersion of Israel, and almost 1800, since that of Judah. The whole tenour of the prophecy evinces, that the Babylonish captivity, and the consequent deliverance of the Jews, were only shadows of the events here predicted. Yet it should be remembered, that the prophecy was delivered while the first temple was standing and frequented, and Jerusalem and Judah in prosperity.—Some render the last verse; “We have long been “as those, whom thou hast not ruled; who have not been “called by thy name.” “Thou hast rejected us altogether, “and dost disregard us, as if we had never had any relation “to thee, nor ever were called thy people: which sense “agrees very well with the present condition of the Jewish “nation, which hath continued for many ages, without “king, or prince, or sacrifice.” Lowth. (Note, Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Our divine Redeemer will appear glorious in the eyes of all holy creatures, when he shall display his power and justice, in taking vengeance on his obstinate enemies, as well as when, in his plenteous mercy and truth, he shews himself mighty to save his people. And, though he deigns not to answer the arrogant questions of proud infidels, he will fully satisfy humble believers of the propriety and equity of his most awful judgments. Once he appeared on earth in apparent weakness, to pour out his precious blood as the atonement for our sins: but he will in due time appear “travelling in the greatness of his strength,” and as it were covered with the blood of his enemies. No numbers or power can secure them against his righteous indignation: nor will he need any helpers in this tremendous work; any more than he did, when “his own self “bare our sins in his own body on the tree.” His single arm suffices to effect salvation, as his single sacrifice did to procure it; and his powerful and righteous indignation will uphold him in executing vengeance on his adversaries: yet he may well complain, that among the numbers who call themselves his disciples, there are scarcely any, at least comparatively few, who stand prepared to be zealous instruments in promoting his cause. But “the acceptable “year of the LORD” is yet proclaimed, though “the day “of vengeance is in his heart,” and the vintage which is to be trodden in the wine-press ripens apace. Let then sinners in general, and the opposers of scriptural Christianity in particular, take warning, and seek reconciliation with their offended Judge: or he will “tread them down in his “anger,” make them “drunk in his fury,” and bring down their strength to the earth; and by the example of his vengeance on them, and such as they are, he will bring others to repent and seek his face.

No sufferings should induce us to forget, or not to mention, “the praises of the LORD,” and his mercies to us and to his people; which have been numberless, and infinite like his essential goodness. All our comforts and hopes spring from this source, and all our miseries and fears from our sins. Every one of the human species receives unmerited mercies from our God; but they are far the most favoured, who enjoy the benefit of his word and ordinances. (Notes, Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20. Rom. iii. 1, 2.) He acts towards his professed people, as if they were and would be sincere; and he rescues them from many dangers and troubles; till their iniquity or apostasy proves that they were dissemblers. But how great is his mercy towards those, who uprightly fear and trust him; who are indeed his children, and neither dissemble with him, nor with their brethren, but copy his example of truth and faithfulness! (Notes, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2. lxxiii. 1. John i. 47—51, v. 47.) He is become their Saviour; he “pities them “as a Father doth his children;” he interests himself in all their concerns, even as if he shared their sufferings; and those who persecute or despise them, are accounted his despisers and persecutors also. (Note, Acts ix. 3—6.) “The Angel of his presence,” the Messenger of the covenant, who “was in the form of God, and thought it no “robbery to be equal with God,” assumed “the form of “a servant,” that in our nature he might bear our griefs and carry our sorrows: and he so loves those, whom he has redeemed by his blood, and taught to trust in and love him, that he bears and carries them with the most unwearied patience. Yet alas! in many instances, they too are rebellious, and “grieve his Holy Spirit,” lose their comforts, and expose themselves to sharp rebukes and corrections; by which they are brought to renewed repentance and deeper humiliation. The Lord indeed never “becomes their enemy, to fight against them,” as he does against those, who so vex his Holy Spirit that he will no more strive with them. (Note, Gen. vi. 3.)—But whatever a man’s sins have been, if he so remembers the Lord’s mercies as to be humbled for his ingratitude, and yet be encouraged to hope in his mercy; there is ground to conclude, that he is discovering the way of peace.—When sinners enquire after him, who has in other ages glorified himself in saving and feeding his purchased flock, and has given his Holy Spirit to qualify his ministers, and prosper their labours; and when they call to mind his wonderful works of old, in order thence to deduce arguments to plead with him in prayer, that he may glorify himself in saving them also; they are evidently profiting by the sacred records: for whenever we look up, by humble faith and hope, to the Lord, “in the habitation of his holiness and glory;” he will be sure to look down upon us in kindness and mercy. His zeal, and power, and compassions are no more restrained, than in former ages: nay, if any have been so abandoned to wickedness, that the most eminent saints are induced to give them up in despair; yet if God see them truly humbled and fervent in prayer, he will doubtless be their Father and Redeemer, for the everlasting glory of his name.—Spiritual judgments, by which men are made to err from the ways, and are hardened against the fear of God, are more to be dreaded than any other calamities; (Note, 2 Thes. ii. 8—12;) and we should most carefully avoid those sins, which provoke the Lord to leave men thus to themselves, and to the deceiver, which he never does without just cause. (Notes, Heb. x. 26—31.) But when any become sensible, that they have verged to this dreadful case, they are in a hopeful way to be preserved from it: and they may confidently beg of God to open their eyes, and understandings, and to humble, soften, and change their hearts: and he will assuredly accept their petitions. Nay, such persons soon become proper supplicants for others in the community or family, who are in the same awful situation, in which they before were.—Thus, we are assured, that the Lord will shortly remove the blindness of the Jewish nation, and return in mercy to those tribes of his inheritance. Indeed, if all the promises made to their fathers had received their whole accomplishment, in the short lived prosperity of Israel in Canaan; it might well be considered as far beneath the largeness of the terms employed. But all the blessings vouchsafed to the true Israel of God, through Christ the promised Seed, in every age, are also to be included: and unknown blessings are yet reserved for that distinguished nation. However, then, God may permit his adversaries to tread down his sanctuary, or to triumph over his people; (Rev. xi. 1, 2;) he will hear the prayers of those who belong to him, and deliver them from those over whom he has not borne rule, and who have never been called by his name. (Note, Ps. xxix. 6—13.)

the dispersed Jews, when the nation of Israel is about to be reinstated in the church. These supplicants perceive immense obstacles in the way of their desires being granted, especially from the power of their oppressors and adversaries: but they most earnestly call upon God to appear and remove them all. They long for him to rend the visible heavens in some awful manner, and to melt the mountains that they might flow down as water at his presence; which he could do with the same facility, as the fire melts the wax, or the metal; or even as it causes the water to boil. Thus, he could make his name known to his adversaries, and put whole nations to confusion and consternation before him. And this would be no unprecedented favour: for when he delivered Israel out of Egypt, he did such terrible things, to crush the power of their oppressors, as they had never looked for, or conceived an idea of: inso much, that opposing difficulties, apparently like immovable mountains, melted and vanished at his presence: and the supplicants only intreat a similar interposition, in order again to set them at liberty, and to reinstate them in their privileges.—The commotion of mount Sinai, when the Lord came down upon it, is referred to in this allusion to their former deliverances. V. 4. No man, from the beginning of the world, had heard, seen, or conceived an idea of any thing so great, glorious, or excellent, as what God himself had devised and prepared for those “who waited for him:” and the displays of the divine power and glory, which the people of God yet wait for, will far exceed all that hitherto has been experienced, witnessed, or recorded, since the beginning; and can only be properly conceived of by God himself. Some explain the verse to mean, that no people had ever heard or conceived of any other God, except JEHOVAH, who had wrought such wonders for his people. (Notes, xliii. 8—13. Deut. iv. 32—40.) St. Paul quotes the sense, (though not the exact words of it,) with reference to the blessings of redemption by the death of Christ: (Note, 1 Cor. ii. 6—9, v. 9:) and perhaps the leading idea here may be, that nothing too great can be expected from that incomprehensible love, which has provided such a salvation for sinful men. (Notes, Rom. v. 6—10. viii. 28—31.)—In many places, the inspired writers of the New Testament quote from the Septuagint: but in this and many other instances, where that version materially varies from the Hebrew, they do not. They give the sense of the passage referred to, as applicable to the subject before them: but do not confine themselves to a strictly literal translation.—The expression, “As it is written,” (1 Cor. ii. 9,) uniformly in the New Testament, means a reference to the sacred writings, “the oracles of God,” and which were revered as such by the Jews; and cannot be understood of any other records.

V. 5. ‘Thou hast heretofore given merciful proofs of thy favour to our forefathers, who rejoiced in thee and walked holily before thee; and so thou art ready to do to those, who awfully and thankfully adore thee in thy ways of justice and mercy. But, ... thou art displeased with us, for we have done wickedly before thee: whereas, if we had the grace to continue in those ways of thine, we should be sure to be saved.’ Bp. Hall. ‘Thou shewedst favour toward our fathers, when they trusted in thee, and walked after thy commandments: they considered thy great mercies.’—“In them is continuance;” that is, “in thy mercies, which he calleth the ways of the LORD.” (Ps. xxv. 10.)—“Thou hast met him who rejoiced and wrought righteousness: these” (all of this character in every age,) “will remember thee in thy ways. Behold thou hast been angry, for we have sinned: in these,” (in thy ways) “is perpetuity, and we shall be saved;” or “may be saved.” This is a literal translation of the verse, which is considered by Bishop Lowth as inexplicable, without entirely conjectural alterations of the text.—“The mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting,” (the very Hebrew word here used,) “upon them that fear him.” (Ps. ciii. 17.) “He waits” perpetually on his mercy-seat, “to be gracious;” “he meets” his worshippers, through every generation, in his ordinances. In these is perpetuity; they are not like the changeable fashions and customs of men: and therefore, though the God of Israel had been wroth with his people for their sins: yet they had now begun to seek him, as the God who had met and blessed their fathers, when they rejoiced in obeying and serving him, and they trusted that he would meet and save them also. (Notes, Ps. xxxvii. 4. cxii. 1. Mal. iii. 13—18, v. 16—18. iv. 2, 3. John vii. 14—17, v. 17. Acts. x. 1—8.) The original word (עוֹלָם) rendered “continuance,” means an indefinite duration, the beginning or termination of which is hidden from man. ‘Notat integram cujusque rei, de qua sermo est, durationem.’ (See Robertson’s Thesaurus.)—‘We have been guilty of great offences, whereby we ‘have provoked thine anger; but thy mercies endure for ever, and thy gracious promises are still the same: and this encourages us still to trust in thy goodness.’ Lowth.

V. 6—8. ‘The best actions of the best men have a great alloy of imperfection. When the Hebrew language would express the most excellent in its kind, it makes use of the plural number. ... Here “righteousnesses” is the most perfect righteousness men can attain to.’ Lowth.—The converted remnant, supplicating in behalf of the Jews, are evidently taught to confess their own sins, as well as those of the nation in every age. (Note, liii. 4—6.) Instead of “the people of God’s holiness,” as they were my proession, “they were all as an unclean thing.” Instead of the robe of righteousness and salvation before spoken of, (Note, lxi. 10, 11,) “all their righteous deeds were as a rejected garment;” (Bp. Lowth;) a garment thrown away, as polluted and worthless. Not only the moral, ritual, or traditional works, (by which the Jews had long sought to justify themselves, neglecting the Saviour and his righteousness,) were abominable, because proud, hypocritical, and unbelieving; but even their present endeavours to seek and serve God, were so imperfect, and mixed with defilement, that they were wholly unmeet to form a robe, in which to appear in his holy presence.—A singular noun, like that plural here rendered “filthy rags,” is frequently rendered ornament, or ornaments, (xlix. 18. Ex. xxxiii. 4. 6. 2 Sam. i. 24. Ez. xvi. 7. 11,) and some would render it so here, and explain it exclusively of “works done to be seen of men;” ‘ostentatious, hypocritical, and vain-glorious services, designed both to acquire human applause, and make compensation for the want of true holiness.’ (Notes, Matt. vi. 1—6.)—But this construction is contrary to most, if not all, the old versions; the expression, “all our righteousnesses are as ornaments,” (for there is no epithet,) is obscure and ambiguous; and these penitents, in confessing their own sins and those of their nation, are supposed only to mean the sins of their past lives, or present actual transgressions, without any humiliating acknowledgment of the imperfection found in their repentance, prayers, and best services. How far Christians should adopt the strong language of our translation, in respect of those righteousnesses which are “the fruits of the Spirit,” is another question. “The fruit of the Spirit” are in themselves most excellent; but the good works which the best of men perform, are no the unmingled “fruits of the Spirit;” for the remaine of in-dwelling sin greatly alloys them. They are all defective, as to reverence, faith, love, gratitude, and fervency and are therefore “rags;” they are all mixed with what is positively wrong, as wandering, foolish, and sinful imagina tions, or improper motives; and so “polluted,” and unmeet to form their robe of righteousness before God. And the more humble and spiritual men become, the greater abhorrence have they of this corrupt alloy; the more they notice, lament, and confess it; and the readier they are, without affectation or direct intention, to use the most humiliating language of scripture concerning themselves and their services. (Marg. Ref. q, r.)—Because of these things, however, the prosperity of Israel was as “a withered leaf;” their iniquities had been as the wind to scatter them abroad throughout the earth: (Note, Jer. iv. 11—13, v. 12:) and there was scarcely one of them, who heartily called upon God, or exerted himself to lay hold by faith, on his power, truth, and love: for he had hid his face from them, and they were consumed, or dissolved, because of their iniquities. Yet they would still plead with the Lord, as their heavenly father; (Notes, lxiii. 11—19. Matt. vi. 9:) they confided in his wisdom and mercy; and, being the work of his creating power, as individuals, and as his chosen nation, they were willing to be disposed of at his pleasure, like clay in the hand of the potter. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, xxix. 13—16. xlv. 9, 10. Jer. xviii. 1—6. Rom. ix. 19—21.)

V. 9—12. The supplicants here continue to deprecate the extremity of the Lord’s displeasure, and his perpetual remembrance of their sins: they still plead with him, as his people, chosen as such in Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and call upon him to consider the desolations of their land. The cities, once inhabited by his worshippers, are now either entirely destroyed, or inhabited by infidels and idolaters, especially Jerusalem their holy city; and their temple with all its furniture and ordinances are utterly wasted: and would not the Lord be satisfied with these their long continued miseries? Would he still refrain from interposing? Would he reject their prayers, and still persist in his hot displeasure to afflict them?—All these circumstances fix the prophetic meaning to the Jewish nation, rather than to the Christian church. And the desolations and miseries of the Jews, since their rejection of the gospel have so immensely exceeded, in degree and continuance, all they before endured; that, (though we need not exclude the Babylonish captivity, or even the ravages and profanations of Antiochus Epiphanes,) we must consider their condition, from the days of Christ to the present time, at length to terminate in the conversion of Israel, and restoration to the holy city and land, as the grand accomplishment of these predictions. (Notes, Gen. lix. 10. Deut. iv. 25—28. xxviii. 28—64.)—It should be kept in mind, that there were no tokens of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, or of the desolations of the land, when Isaiah wrote this prophecy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The difficulties, which occur in our path or work, should excite us to more vigorous exercises of faith in the omnipotence and faithfulness of God, and to more fervent prayers for his interposition; for when he pleases to “rend the heavens and come down,” the most insuperable obstacles remove in an instant: and we can never want a prevalent plea with him thus to interpose, when we are seeking the glory of his name, and the enlargement or prosperity of his church: for he will assuredly “make his name known to his adversaries, that the nations may tremble at his presence.” (Note, Rev. i. 7.)—The deliverances, which the Lord works for his people, are sometimes as unexpected, in the manner and season of them, as his terrible judgments on his enemies are to them. The sacred records of the ancient church have been transmitted to us, to encourage our hopes and prayers, for personal and public mercies, according to the promises, and the nature of our dispensation. But who has heard, or seen, or conceived, any thing equal to the love of God, in “sending his Son to be the propitiation for our sins?” Can we really believe this truth, and then think any thing too great, to be expected from his power, truth, and mercy? We have very faint conceptions of the glorious things, which are prepared for his church on earth; and our ideas of the felicities of heaven are far more inadequate: let us then trust in his word, and patiently wait for him to terminate our sorrows and complete our joys. If he have taught us to “rejoice in working righteousness,” and to “remember him in his ways;” he will doubtless meet us with supports and comforts in his ordinances, and perfect his work in us. We have indeed grievously sinned, and provoked him to anger: yet Jesus continually intercedes; the way of access and acceptance is always open; and those who come to the Father by him, shall be “saved to the uttermost,” and for ever.—But we must confess, that by nature “we are all as an unclean thing, and that all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.” Thus it was with every one of us, when strangers or enemies to him: and even now our few good works, in which there is real excellency as “the fruits of the Spirit,” are so defective and defiled as performed by us, that they need to be washed in “the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness.” They, therefore, who confide in their own merits, will fade as a leaf, and will be driven, by the wrath of God against their iniquities, into eternal misery.—But alas! how few are there, who even appear to call on the Lord with their whole hearts, or stir themselves up to lay hold of him! Without this earnestness we cannot hope to prevail: but the vilest prodigal, who, being “come to himself,” desires to return

They were a people, who continually provoked God in the most avowed manner, even in his more immediate presence, at Jerusalem and the temple. In contempt of his law, they chose to sacrifice in gardens and on high places: nay, they “burnt incense” also “upon altars of brick” or tile, or on the tops of their houses: (Jer. xix. 5. Zeph. i. 5. Notes, Ex. xx. 21—25. 2 Kings xxiii. 12, 13;) though this ought to have been done by none but the priests, within the sanctuary, on the golden altar, or on their censers.—Because God had made the touch of a dead body, or grave, a ceremonial uncleanness; (Note, Num. xix. 11;) they abode, or dwelt, and lodged among the tombs, for superstitious or idolatrous purposes; and as using witchcraft or necromancy: and, despising his authority, they ate swine’s flesh, and carried even the broth made of unclean meats, or parts of the abominable sacrifices to their idols, in their vessels, perhaps for acceptable presents to their friends. (Note, Lev. xi. 3—8.) These were evidences of their self-will and presumptuous rebellion, and preference of their own inventions to the appointments of God, and of their carnal enmity to him and his holy service. Yet, at the same time they were full of a proud opinion of superior sanctity, and despised others as unworthy to come near them. (Notes, Matt. ix. 10—13. John ix. 27—34, v. 34. Rev. iii. 17.) This hateful temper was peculiarly prevalent among the Pharisees, especially in the days of Christ: and, notwithstanding their hypocrisy and iniquity, they deemed themselves the only favourites of heaven, and could disdainfully say to a poor heathen, or publican, or harlot, even when penitently crying for mercy, ‘Stand off, keep thy distance, I am holier than thou.’ (Note, Luke xviii. 9—14. P. O. 1—17.) These were exceedingly abominable to the Lord: even as smoke is offensive to the man, who has it continually under his nose. The nearer they approached to him, the more he abhorred them; and thus they kindled his indignation, and rendered it as “a fire that burneth all the day.” Their sins from age to age being written before him; he would not always keep silence, but would certainly recompense upon the generation who crucified Christ and rejected his gospel, all the iniquities of their fathers as well as their own transgressions: (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 29—36;) and, as their posterity have ever since persisted in the same spirit of enmity to Christ, they have inherited as a legacy this sentence denounced upon that generation.—The swine was the most common sacrifice among idolaters; and therefore more abhorred by conscientious Jews, than any other unclean animal.—By “the broth of abominable things,” many understand the kid seethed in his mother’s milk, which is repeatedly forbidden in the law. (Note, Ex. xxiii. 9.)

Therefore will I measure their former work, &c. (7) “I will pour into their bosom the full measure of their former deeds.” Bp. Lowth.—The idolatries of former ages, committed by Israel, having been filled up as a measure, by crucifying Christ and persecuting his servants, were punished in the judgments inflicted on that subsequent generation of the nation.

V. 8—10. In the bunch of unripe grapes, which is at present of no value, the new wine is contained as in embryo; and therefore the owner gives orders that it may not be destroyed, “because a blessing is in it.” Thus the nation of Israel has been spared through many generations, for the sake of those believers, who shall hereafter arise from it: and the Jews have been preserved a distinct people, that all men may witness this remarkable accomplishment of ancient prophecies and promises. Had not the Lord kept this mercy in store for the remote posterity of “his servants,” Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he would have destroyed the whole nation by the Romans and others, when they were cast out of the church. (Notes, vi. 13. x. 21—23. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. Rom. xi. 22—32.) But he had determined in process of time to bring a spiritual seed out of Jacob, to inherit the privileges of his true people on earth and in heaven. Of these Canaan was a type: and these privileges may be denoted by Sharon and Achor, two distant parts of the land, feeding flocks and herds for their use, when they should have returned to seek the Lord.—It seems also evident that the nation, when converted, will be restored to their own land, and enjoy its productions as in ancient days. (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 35—40. Ez. xlvi.) There was indeed “a remnant, according to the election of grace,” reserved when the Jews were rejected: but the events above-mentioned seem more immediately predicted. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Rom. xi. 1—6.)

V. 11, 12. The Lord here addresses the idolatrous Jews, who willingly forgot mount Zion, to offer sacrifices to a whole troop, a great number of worthless idols; furnishing out a table and feasting together in honour of them.
(Note, Gen. xxx. 11.) Or, the words “Gad” and “Meni,” (marg.) translated “troop” and “number,” may be the names of idols. ‘Preparing a table to the dæmon, and ‘filling a mixture,’ (or, a drink offering of mixed wine,)
‘to fortune.’ Sept.—‘The holy scriptures did not deign
‘to explain more clearly what these objects of idolatrous ‘worship were; but chose rather that the memory of the ‘knowledge of them should be utterly abolished. And ‘God be praised, that they are so totally abolished, that ‘we are quite at a loss to know, what and what sort of ‘things they were.’ Schimidius in Bp. Lowth. What perverse pains then do many learned men bestow to bring them again to light; and to explain that which we should be thankful to God is almost wholly forgotten! But these abominations are so consigned to oblivion, that the meaning of the sacred writers cannot be ascertained.—Though the Jews in the days of Christ, and in succeeding ages, did not commit gross idolatries; yet they manifested the same spirit of rebellion, perverseness, and enmity to God.
He therefore added, that he would number them to the sword, as criminals ordered for execution, and like them they should bow down to be slaughtered: because when Christ and his apostles called them, they would not answer, nor be obedient, but deliberately chose and persisted in those things, in which he could not delight; that is, such as he utterly abhorred. (Notes, l. 1—3. Matt. xxi. 33—44.)—Wherein I delighted not. (12) Note, Jer. vii. 31.

V. 13—15. When the Romans were about to besiege Jerusalem, the Christians, perceiving the signals of approaching desolations, and obeying the directions of their Lord, left the devoted city and land; but the bulk of the nation, pertinaciously defending themselves, endured the extremest miseries. Thus the Christians were well provided for, in all respects, and rendered abundantly joyful in the Lord, while the Jews were perishing with hunger and thirst, and were howling with anguish and despair.—Nay, so great were their obstinacy and misery, that the chosen, or elect servants of God could think of no more dreadful curse, to deprecate from themselves and their friends, than the judicial blindness and hardness of heart, the wickedness and punishment of a Jew!—(Notes, Jer. xxix. 21—23. Zech. viii. 9—15, v. 13.) In a short time millions were slain, by one dire massacre after another; the nation was cut off from being the people of God; and “Jews” was no longer the distinguishing appellation of JEHOVAH’S worshippers, but he has called his servants by another name, even by that of “Christians.” (Note, lxii. 1—5.)

—“The Lord God ... shall call his servants by another “name.” (15) ‘This may mean, changing the name of Jew ‘into that of Christian.’ Lowth. This confirms the opinion, that God himself, by immediate revelation, gave the name of CHRISTIANS, to the disciples of Jesus; which they have borne in all ages and nations ever since, to this present day. (Note, Acts xi. 25, 26, v. 26.)

V. 16. The introduction of the Christian dispensation, and the rejection of the Jews, or Israelites, made way for the propagation of true religion among the nations, which could not so readily be done, whilst the Jews continued the peculiar people of God, and the worship of the temple was maintained. So that the events before predicted, came to pass, in order that men in every part of the earth might bless themselves in the name of the God of truth, or seek happiness from him, (Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3. Ps. lxxii. 17 —19,) and that they might swear by his name as his worshippers, and not by that of any idol. The truth of the scriptures being clearly demonstrated, by the accomplishment of these prophecies, would conduce to the conviction of the nations; lead them to regard JEHOVAH as “the “God of truth,” worthy to be feared and trusted; and excite them to imitate his truth in their professions and engagements. (Notes, xlv. 23—25. Ps. xxii. 27—31. Jer. xvi.

church shall be past, and as it were forgotten; and when God will forgive, and no more look upon, the sins which occasioned them: when the Jews shall again be called into the church, and the fulness of the Gentiles be converted. —‘The Hebrew reads AMEN: so the expression,’ (“the God of truth,”) ‘may properly be understood of Christ, ‘who is “the true God,” (1 John v. 21,) and called AMEN, ‘or, the Truth, Rev. iii. 14, probably in allusion to this ‘place. (Comp. 2 Cor. i. 20;) and the words import, that ‘all spiritual blessings shall be derived from him.’ Lowth. (Notes, 2 Cor. i. 17—20. 1 John v. 20, 21. Rev. iii. 14—16.)—Our Lord is the only person, recorded in scripture, who used the words rendered “Verily I say unto you,” or, “Verily, verily, I say unto you:” and the original is “Amen, Amen.” (Notes, Matt. vi. 5. John iii. 3.)

V. 17—19. The apostles, Peter and John, use the expressions, “new heavens and a new earth,” for the heavenly state, after the end of the world and the day of judgment; (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 10—13. Rev. xxi. 1—4;) and St. Peter says, that “we look for it according to his promise,” which may refer to this very passage: yet the context requires us to interpret the words, in this place, of that state of the church on earth, which shall most resemble the world of glory, in knowledge, holiness, and felicity, and which will terminate in it. (Note, lx. 15—22.)—By the new-creating power of God, the circumstances of the church, and the character of men, shall be so altered, that it will appear as entirely a new world; so that the former confusions, iniquities, and miseries of the human race shall be no more remembered, or renewed. (Note, Rev. xx. 1—6.) The servants of God are therefore commanded to rejoice in this new state of things, which he was about to create: for he would make Jerusalem, (the true church,) and all her inhabitants joyful, and a joy to all around them: nay, he would rejoice in them, and put a final end to all their sorrows and complaints. (Notes, xxv. 6—8. xxxv. 8—10. Zeph. iii. 14—20. Rev. vii. 13—17.)

V. 20. The approaching happy condition of the church is next described, under a variety of images, many of which we have not before met with. Longevity is here promised, and premature death seems excluded from this state. “From that time,” children shall not generally be cut off in infancy, nor even old men till they have filled the measure of their days. Insomuch, that he shall be thought to die in his youth, who lives to the age of a hundred years: whilst the sinner, who lives to a hundred years of age, shall at last die accursed; or, he that shall die at the age of a hundred years, shall be considered as dying in his youth, as a punishment for his sins. The event alone can certainly determine whether this is meant literally or figuratively: but it is evident, that the universal prevalence of real Christianity would so terminate wars, murders, contention, idleness, intemperance, and licentiousness, as greatly to lengthen out the general term of man’s life. Many diseases, which now destroy thousands and tens of thousands, in the prime of life, and communicate distempers and feeble bodies to succeeding generations, would in that case scarcely be heard of any more: and thus the human constitution would soon be greatly improved, and children would generally come into the world more vigorous and healthy, than they can do while vice so greatly prevails. What God may further intend in this matter we cannot determine.—‘The prophet describes this renovation of the world, as a ‘paradisaical state, and such as the patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, when men commonly lived near a thousand years. So that he that died at an hundred years of age, would have been looked upon as dying in his childhood; and be judged to have been cut off in the beginning of his years, as a punishment of some great sins ‘he had committed.’ Lowth.

V. 21—23. Here the outward peace of the church, and her freedom from persecutions, seem principally intended. Every one in those happy days shall be allowed to possess the fruit of his labours, and shall live long to enjoy it: and even to wear it out: (Deut. xxviii. 30—32;) for their days shall be as the days of a tree. An oak is supposed to be meant, which will sometimes endure a thousand years from the time when it is planted, till that of its total decay: and thus the days of God’s chosen shall be as those of the antediluvians.—But may not this refer to the thousand years, during which Satan shall be bound up, and the prosperity of the church continue? (Notes, Rev. xx. 1—6.)—Nor will children then be the trouble of their parents, heirs of trouble themselves, or “a short lived race;” Bp. Lowth; but their blessings shall be entailed on their offspring also.—The converted Gentiles, as well as the Israelites, will be owned as the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, “the blessed of the LORD;” and with their posterity inherit the blessings promised to them and their

The prayers of the people shall then be answered without delay, and in the most abundant manner: for, whereas we now pray, that “the knowledge of the glory of God may fill the earth as the waters cover the sea,” and ages pass on before our prayers are answered; their desires in this respect shall be granted before they speak: for then “the name of God will be hallowed, his kingdom come, and his will done on earth,” in great measure, “as it is in heaven.” (Notes, Matt. vi. 9. Rev. xi. 15—18.) The malignant dispositions of sinners of every description will then be most completely mortified, and they will all become harmless amiable, and harmonious. (Notes, ii. 2—5. ix. 6, 7, v. 7. xi. 6—9.) The old serpent shall then be deprived of his prey, and have the ancient sentence fully executed upon him. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Mic. vii. 14—17. Rev. 20. 1—3.) And thus the church on earth shall be full of peace and happiness, like heaven. None can doubt, that this yet remains to be accomplished.

Shall feed together. (25) “Shall feed as one:” as if both were of one nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The Lord may say of all, who are numbered among his people on earth, or in heaven, that “he was found of them who sought him not.” When we were strangers and enemies, “foolish and disobedient, serving divers lusts and pleasures,” he prevented us by the call of his word, and the influences of his grace: and whenever, or in what manner soever, we were disposed to seek the Lord; he first suggested the thought, and created the disposition, and, having thus led us to seek and pray unto him, he further made himself and his ways known unto us. (Notes, xlii. 13—17, v. 16. Eph. ii. 4—10. Tit. iii. 3—7.) Often he meets with some thoughtless trifler, or remorseless profligate, or prejudiced opposer, and, as it were, says to him, “Behold me, here I am,” come to me; “Look unto me, and be saved;” and a speedy change takes place; Saul is found among the Christians and apostles, and a spiritual worshipper appears in the church of God: whilst others, brought up under the gospel, to whom the Lord daily “stretches forth his hands,” proffering salvation to them, grow more and more rebellious, and follow their own perverse inclinations and evil courses, in defiance of him. (Note, Matt. xix. 29, 30.)—Too often likewise, he has cause to say of his professed worshippers, that they “are a people, who provoke him continually to his face;” and that they manifest the same ungrateful spirit, and rebellious alienation from him, and the same perverse disposition to prefer their own inventions to his ordinances, truths, and precepts, as the nation of Israel did.—Where the power of godliness is decayed, men become proud of the worthless form: and plausible hypocrites are of all men most prone to look on the ignorant, the erroneous, the careless, the immoral, or profane, with disdain and loathing: nay, they condemn the humble and penitent, and say of those, in whom God delights, “Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou!” When knowledge, gifts, reputation, or religious performances, foster this hateful propensity, they become most injurious to the possessor: and, however he may admire himself, or be admired by others, he is as odious and displeasing unto God, as “a smoke in the nose;” and nothing more kindles or feeds the fire of his indignation, than such a disposition and conduct. Let us then watch and pray against pride and self-preference: remembering that every sin, and the most secret thoughts of men’s hearts are written before God, and will assuredly be brought to light, and recompensed upon every impenitent sinner: and when nations or churches have filled up their measure of iniquity, they will be punished with temporal judgments for their own sins, and for those of their fathers which they have imitated.—Among the various reasons, which induce the Lord to spare ungodly men, one is, that “a blessing is in them.” Some one, or more, or many, perhaps very many, shall descend from them, to form a part of his chosen flock; and therefore he bears with them from year to year, that he may “bring forth a seed out of them to inherit his holy mountain.” All things indeed are for the sake of his chosen people: the kingdom of providence is administered, and the frame of nature is preserved, for the display of the glory of God in his church of redeemed sinners. (Notes, 1 Cor. iii. 18—23, vv. 21—23. 2 Cor. iv. 13—18, v. 15.)

V. 11—25.

In every age and nation, the Lord consigns to destruction those, who forsake his service to follow their own lusts and devices; and especially such as persist in doing evil in contempt of the call of his Gospel.—Sometimes he makes an evident discrimination on earth, between his servants and his enemies: but this will be uniformly visible hereafter; and whilst his servants will be satisfied with his love, filled with joy, and abound in his praise, his enemies shall endure the extremest miseries, in the regions of despair, where are “weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth.” (Notes, Matt. viii. 10. 12. xxii. 11—14.) That the declarations of God’s word to this effect will be exactly accomplished, we may be assured, by the long continued contempt and miseries of the Jews: for the Lord has indeed left their name to be “a curse unto his chosen,” having cut them off, and called his people by another name; as he declared that he would. But when they shall be restored to their privileges, the truth of God will be rendered still more conspicuous: that all the earth may “bless “themselves in him,” render him worship, and swear unto him in truth and righteousness. Then the long continued troubles of the church shall cease, and her prosperity will commence. But what a change will this be, when the earth shall be filled with spiritual religion, and exact righteousness! It may well be called “new heavens and a new earth:” for as we can scarcely frame an idea of so glorious a scene; so the inhabitants of the world, in that blessed period, will not be able to form an idea of the wretched and confused state of the earth, during the long continued and general prevalence of vice and impiety. We shall not live to share this joy and gladness: but we may mix our lamentations over the scenes which we now witness, with rejoicings in the prospect of happier times: and, if we be indeed believers, we shall in heaven share the joy of them when they actually arrive. Our troubles also will soon be terminated by death, and our God will rejoice over us to do us good for ever. (Notes, lxi. 10, 11. Jer. xxxii. 39—41. Zeph. iii. 14—17.) Even the natural evils of the world would be inconceivably diminished, if all men were true and consistent Christians: and their lives would be prolonged, and rendered more comfortable in every respect. Yet if prepared for heaven, and if we have finished our work on earth; we need not complain of dying too young: for all the ends of life will be answered, as much as if we had lived to be a hundred years old. But the sinner must be miserable, whether he live to be old and to “treasure up wrath,” or be cut off young, and cast into destruction: and all his planting, building, and labouring must be left to others; whilst he is driven away in his wickedness. On the other hand, the believer may rejoice even in his temporal labours, that some, perhaps many, will be benefited by them, when he is removed to a better inheritance; where he shall long enjoy the gracious recompence of all his services, yea, even for ever and ever: and he may also hope that his children will be favoured after him, as “the seed of the blessed of the LORD,” and pray with much encouragement, for them and his more remote posterity.—Though our prayers are not now always answered immediately, yet they will be in due time: and the more instant and fervent we are in this respect, the fuller evidence we shall possess that the Lord regards the desires of our hearts, and sometimes grants them, before we can express them in words, or whilst we are yet speaking: so that we are employed in praise, when we meant to be pouring out our prayers. But let us especially pray to be changed, from wolves and lions, into lambs and doves, and to be made harmless, gentle, and useful: then we may be assured, that “God will bruise Satan under our feet shortly,” and that we shall be admitted to his holy habitation, where none shall hurt or destroy, but all shall be love and enjoyment, for ever and ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXVI. V. 1, 2. (Notes, lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. 9—12.) The Jews at all times, and especially in our Saviour's days, were extremely attached to the temple, and its splendid external worship, which was one cause of their opposition to his spiritual kingdom and ordinances. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—62, vv. 61, 62. xxvii. 39—44, v. 40. Acts vi. 9—14, vv. 13, 14.) Just before the birth of Christ they had, by king Herod's assistance, almost entirely rebuilt the temple with great magnificence, having been forty-six years employed about it. (Notes, Hag. ii. 6—9. John ii. 18—22.) To this period the prophecy seems especially to relate: and the Lord addresses them, as engaged in this work, or glorying in it; and reminds them, that heaven was his throne of glory, and the earth his footstool; and that he wanted no house, or resting place, of their building. (Notes, 1 Kings viii. 27. Acts vii. 44—50.) The typical intention and temporary use of the temple were nearly accomplished; the labour and confidence of the Jews were vain; and the whole of that dispensation waxed old, and was ready to vanish away. (Notes, Acts vi. 9—14. Heb. viii. 7—13.) The heavens and the earth, which he made, had long continued and would still remain; but the temple and its worship “had been” for a while, and would soon be no more: for henceforth his temple on earth, to which he would have peculiar regard, would be the heart of the poor contrite penitent, who revered, and obeyed, and trembled at his word; whereas those who adhered to the temple and its worship, were proud blind Pharisees and hypocrites, or others, who despised both his authority and his gospel. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, lvii. 15, 16. 2 Kings xxii. 15—20, v. 19. Ps. li. 17. Matt. v. 3, 4.)

did not want the temple for his habitation; yet it was both honourable and necessary, as the place appointed for the offering of sacrifices: but the Lord by his prophet here teaches them, that this institution was about to be superseded, nay, to become a mark of obstinate rebellion to those who adhered to it.—Some interpreters suppose, that he reproves the wickedness of those, who brought their sacrifices to the temple, whilst they were living in the practice of murder, or the grossest crimes; “He that slayeth an ox, killeth a man, &c.” Bp. Lowth. (Notes, i. 16—20. Jer. vii. 8—11.) But it is not to be imagined, that any Jews, during or after the days of Christ, actually offered a dog, or swine's blood, in sacrifice, or that the priests blessed or worshipped idols. ‘These two chapters manifestly relate to the calling of the Gentiles, the establishment of the Christian dispensation, and the reprobation of the apostate Jews, and their destruction executed by the Romans.’ Bp. Lowth. The passage indeed does not merely imply, that their hypocrisy rendered their sacrifices abominable to God, though they were his own institutions: but the evident meaning is, that the coming and sacrifice of Christ would virtually abrogate the ceremonial law, and render all its observances nugatory; and that the Jews, who persisted in them, not as indifferent things, but in contempt of Christ and his priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession, would be guilty of as gross an affront to God, as if they had committed murder, or the most atrocious profanation, or idolatry. For in so doing, they would choose their own proud and rebellious ways, delight in their own abominations, and shew their contempt of JEHOVAH's authority, and enmity to his holiness; even as much as their fathers did, when they were mad upon their idols. (Notes, i. 1—3. lxv. 3—7. 11, 12, v. 12.) He would therefore choose their delusions, as the means of bringing his judgments upon them: (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 19—23. Ez. xiv. 6—11. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12:) and as they rejected and crucified Christ, avowedly for fear of the Romans; he would bring their fears upon them, and the Romans should execute his vengeance on them, in consequence of their unbelief and disobedience. (Notes, lxv. 11—15. John xi. 49—53. Heb. x. 26—31.)

V. 5, 6. The Jewish converts to Christianity seem to be here addressed. They trembled at the word of God, and revered his authority: but, by embracing the gospel, they were exposed to the extreme hatred of their countrymen, who excommunicated and persecuted them for the Lord's sake, and out of a pretended or mistaken furious zeal for his glory: (Notes, Matt. v. 10—12. x. 16—18. Luke vi. 21—23. John ix. 19—23. 35—38. xvi. 1—3:) but he assured them, that he would appear to their joy, and for the confusion of their persecutors; which was awfully accomplished in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem; and when the Christians left the devoted city and neighbourhood, retired to Pella, and were preserved in peace and comfort. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 15—18.) The Jews indeed trusted in the external sanctity of the city and temple: yet within their walls, and even in the courts of the temple, the Lord would execute vengeance on them, as his enemies; and their outcries and lamentations, would declare that he was rendering a recompence unto them, even for the abuse of those institutions, on which they ignorantly and presumptuously depended for safety.—‘The prophet seems to hear the noise of the ruin of the city and temple sounding in his ears. ...The voice from the temple was verified in that voice, which Josephus tells us ...was heard in the temple, a little before the final destruction of it, saying, Let us depart hence.’ Lowth.

Your brethren, &c. (5) Some explain this of the hatred borne to the Jews by the Gentiles, and their cruel oppressions of them: but unbelieving Jews cannot be said, to revere, or “tremble at the word of God;” (Note, 1, 2;) and the context seems not to admit of this interpretation.

V. 7—9. When the temple should be destroyed, Jerusalem desolated, the instituted worship not only abrogated, but rendered impracticable, and the ancient people of God cast off; it might be apprehended, that he would no longer have a church, or at least that the number of his worshippers would be very small. In answer to this rising thought of his people, JEHOVAH by the prophet here assures them, that the church should at that time be exceedingly increased, by the addition of the converted Gentiles to the remnant of believing Jews. The ancient church and nation of Israel were not produced in less than four hundred and thirty years, from the calling of Abraham to the promulgation of the law by Moses: but the holy nation, now to be subject to the government of God, should be rapidly formed. Zion, represented as a pregnant woman, would be delivered of a son, even before her travailing pains came upon her: (Note, Ex. i. 19:) nay, her children would increase so rapidly, that a nation would seem to be born at once: and they would so speedily arrive at maturity, that it would be, as if the earth produced and ripened the harvest in one day. These events would indeed be unprecedented, and such as never before had been heard of; but they would certainly take place: the almighty God would bring the affairs of his church to so critical a situation, that this deliverance and increase must be afforded her, or she must perish: (Note, 2 Kings xix. 3:) and could any think that he, who espoused Zion, and was the Father of all her children, would fail of giving her effectual assistance in this extremity? (Notes, liii. 9, 10. liv. 1—5. Gal. iv. 21—31. Rev. xii. 1—6.)—‘We may understand the former part of this sentence, of the speedy propagation of the gospel through the world; and the latter part of it of the sudden conversion of the Jews, and their union with the gentiles into one church, when “God will remove the iniquity of the land in one day.” Zech. iii. 9. Comp. Mic. v. 3. These two events, though distant in time, yet will agree very much in the swiftness of their progress.’ Lowth. (Notes, Mic. v. 3, 4. Zech. iii. 9, 10.)

V. 10—14. The Lord here calls on all, who love his church, and sympathize with her in her sorrows, to rejoice at the approach of her great prosperity. (Notes, Ps. cii. 13—22. cxxxvii. 1—6. Rev. xi. 3—18.) The consolations, which would be prepared for all her children, in the promises and ordinances of the gospel, must be sought by earnest faith and prayer, as the infant desires the nutritional milk, and draws it out from the mother's breast. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 1—3, v. 2.) Thus all true believers would be satisfied and sanctified by her spiritual provisions, as well as enriched and delighted by the abundance, or the splendour, of her glory. For in due time the Lord would bestow on her peace and prosperity, in large measure, and with durable increase; and the most honourable and renowned of the nations would continue to flow into her, like the perpetual stream, or flowing branches of some large river. (Note, xlviii. 17—19.) Nor would this be any diminution to the privileges of Zion's former children, but an increase of them: as they would be nourished and attended to, with still greater care and tenderness; being peculiarly loved and cherished by the Gentile converts. (Notes, Acts xi. 27—30. Rom. xv. 22—29.) Nay, the Lord himself would comfort them, not only with the prudent affection of a Father, but with tender blandishments and compassions resembling those of a fond mother. (Note, ix. 4—7.) The prosperity of the church would add to their consolations, and cause their souls to thrive more abundantly; whilst the power of God would thus be manifested in favour of his servants, and his indignation in the punishment of his adversaries.—The sacred writer gradually, and almost insensibly, passes from the primitive times, to those more glorious events, to which he so frequently recurs; in which the conversion and restoration of Israel is a prominent part; but it does not appear to be in this place exclusively, or even primarily foretold. (Notes, Rom. xi. 11—15. Rev. xix. 1—6.)

V. 15—18. This seems a general prophetic declaration of the Lord's vengeance, on all the enemies of his church, through successive generations: especially the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, in the first ages of Christianity, and that of all antichristian opposers of the Gospel, in the latter days. God himself would come, with fiery indignation, and the instruments of his vengeance, to “plead with all flesh,” and make terrible slaughter among them. (Notes, xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.) The persons intended were guilty of many idolatries and superstitions, the description of which seems to be taken from the abominations, to which some of the Jews were addicted in the prophet's days. They sanctified themselves for the idolatrous sacrifices, which they offered in gardens, or groves, behind some one sacred tree in the midst, (or to Achad, an idol so called, and supposed to mean the sun:) and then they

20 And they shall ^dbring all your brethren for ^ean offering unto the LORD, out of all nations, ^fupon horses, and in chariots, and in ^{*}litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to ^gmy holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.

feasted on unclean animals, as if in contempt and defiance of God. (Note, 3, 4.) These their works, and wicked thoughts, the Lord knew of long before, and would certainly punish: and he would shew all nations his glory in the destruction of his enemies, and by the promulgation of his Gospel. (Notes, Ps. cxlix. 7—9. Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Joel iii. 9—17. Rev. xiv. 14—20. xvi. 11—16. xix. 11—21.)—‘We must not be too positive, in assigning the particular place, time, or manner, how these prophecies shall be fulfilled; because the events are secret, whose causes lie hid as yet in the depths of providence. And the very great obscurity of the prophecies, which are supposed to relate to these matters, is to me a convincing argument, that they are not yet fulfilled.’ Louth.

V. 19—23. (Notes, xi. 11—16. xxiv. 13—16. lx. 1—22. lxi. 4—6. lxxv. 17—19.) When the standard of the gospel was first set up, the Jews who had been converted to Christ, and so “escaped” the general ruin of the nation, (οἱ σωζόμενοι, the saved,) were sent as preachers to the Gentiles: and in like manner, it is probable that God will select some, who have been rescued from the corruptions of antichristianity, to preach to the nations, far and near, where his fame and glory have never yet been heard and seen; even to isles as remote from us and as little known to us, as this our island was to the inhabitants of the East in the days of Isaiah. The persons thus converted are immediately considered as brethren: and they would be brought, by every method of conveyance then in use in those countries, to Jerusalem, as a sacred oblation to the Lord. This signifies the abundance of instruments and means, afforded for the conversion of sinners, and the admission of the converts into the church; and for their encouragement, edification, and devotedness to God, until they are brought to heaven. (Note, Rom. xv. 14—17.)—Ministers were soon raised up from among the Gentiles, in the apostles’ days, who ministered before God in holy things, (as the priests and Levites had been used to do,) according to the nature of their dispensation: and ministers will doubtless be hereafter raised up among the inhabitants of those nations, which are now sunk in the deepest ignorance and barbarity. For as God intended his new creation to endure before him for ever; so should the seed and name of the church under the Christian dispensation. They too would have their solemnities, sabbaths, sacraments, and ordinances, in which they would meet before the Lord: and all flesh, or all nations, would thus come to worship before him.—‘Whereas before, there were appointed seasons to sacrifice; in this there shall be one continued sabbath.’—The restoration of Israel is here implied: but this event cannot be considered as the exclusive meaning. None of Israel could be taken as priests and Levites, who were not of Aaron’s family, or of the tribe of Levi: the priests and Levites, therefore, must be ministers of religion from among the Gentiles, or the converted Jews, who were not of that family or tribe; which cannot be the case among the Jews, if the ceremonial law were to be revived, at the restoration of Israel. (Notes, Rom. xv. 14—17. Phil. ii. 14—18, v. 17.)—To Tarshish, &c. (19) Marg. Ref. z, a, b.—Notes, Gen. x. 15—30.

V. 24. The inhabitants of the holy city, and all who had come thither, are here represented as going out, to look upon the dead bodies of those, whom the Lord had slain for opposing his cause; which are represented as being either eaten by worms, or burnt in the fire. (Notes, Ez. xxxix. 11—16.) But “their worm would never die, nor their fire be quenched:” for whatever external events may be alluded to or predicted, “the worm” and “the fire” represent the place and nature of the punishment of sinners in another world. The fire, which is kindled by the wrath of God, shall not be quenched or cease to torment for ever: the worm of keen self-reflection, and the anguish of an accusing conscience, will endure for ever, because the existence and consciousness of the condemned will be everlasting. (Notes, Matt. v. 21, 22. 29, 30. Mark ix. 43—50.)—Some interpret the carcasses cast out of Jerusalem, to signify the ungodly who are excluded from the church, and remain under the wrath of God, and the power of their own wicked propensities and evil habits; and who, being thus abhorred on earth, will be miserable and abominable for ever in hell. ‘Our Saviour ... expressed the place of torment, under the image of Gehenna; and the punishment of the wicked, by the worm which there preyed on the carcases, and the fire which consumed the wretched victims. Marking, however, in the strongest manner, the difference between Gehenna, and the invisible place of torment; namely, that in the former the suffering is transient; the worm itself, that preys on the body, dies; and the fire, which totally consumes it, is soon extinguished: whereas in the figurative Gehenna, the instruments of punishment shall be everlasting, and the suffering without end; for there "the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Bp. Lowth.

Thus ends this most extraordinary prophecy; to which nothing similar is extant in the world.—In the other prophecies, God speaks by the prophet, or the prophet says, "Thus saith the LORD." But from the beginning of the fortieth chapter to the end of this book, JEHOVAH, or MESSIAH, speaks in a continued discourse, in a few instances indeed noticing and directing the prophet, but still proceeding to speak as immediately from himself.—In the prophecies of Daniel, and in the Revelation of John, as well as the other prophetic writings; there are certain dates, or a regular order, which help us to understand to what period of time each prediction belongs: but in Isaiah, especially in the latter part of the book, the transition from the days of the prophet, to those after the captivity, or rather, those of the Messiah; and thence to the glorious times which we yet expect, and to the consummation of all things, is often sudden and unexpected. And as suddenly the prophecy reverts to the coming of Christ, and events connected with it. This increases the expositor's difficulty; and should increase his caution and diffidence, as to the interpretation given of many parts.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

No externals, however splendid or costly, can please God, without a humble and upright heart. He wants not, and is not profited by, any of our services: and when we become proud of them, or trust in them; he abhors our attendance even on his own appointments. As he dwells in Christ, our Temple; so, for his sake, "he hath respect to every one that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at his word:" for such persons value his salvation, and learn to love him and keep his commandments. But whatever men substitute in the place of the priesthood, atonement, and intercession of Christ, will be found most hateful to God: and he will as deeply resent this affront to his wisdom, grace, and truth, as any immorality or profaneness whatever. Yet alas! how many in this most important concern, "choose their own ways, and are delighted with their own abominations!" But we should be afraid of every deviation from scriptural truth, lest God should give us over to our own delusions.—Those who so far from the reproach or opposition of men, as to refuse the will and reject the salvation of God, will have their fears brought upon them in everlasting shame and contempt.—Being, that many have thought they did God service, when they were "hating and casting out" his children; we should take care that our confidence and conscientiousness be scriptural. It will not avail a man to have said, "Let God be glorified," when in proud self-confidence and obstinate rage, he persecuted his people, and refused to ask counsel of his word and Spirit. But those who "tremble at the word of God," need not be alarmed even at the hatred of their professed brethren, or staggered by their "great swelling words of vanity;" as if they alone were the only true church, and all who differed from them were hereticks and schismatics. Such boasts and censures are alike unwarranted: God will appear to the joy of the humble believer, and to the confusion of hypocrites and persecutors of every description; their destruction will come upon them in those very places, from those very persons, or by those very means, in which they presumptuously confided for safety; and they shall be accounted the enemies of God with a peculiar emphasis, and be punished with marked severity.

V. 7—14.

When the Lord lessens the numbers of his visible church, by cutting off hypocrites and persecutors; we need not fear, but he will supply their places by more valuable persons. He can add converts in multitudes, as though "a nation were born in a day." In the general course of Providence, we must expect to labour, wait, and pray for a considerable time, before we see the success of our work: and ministers must even "travail in birth," by their anxious desires and fervent wrestlings, before children are brought forth unto God. (Note, Gal. iv. 17—20.) They must also wait, as the husbandman for the precious fruits of the earth; and at last be thankful even for a few seals to their ministry. But when the Lord is pleased to interpose in an extraordinary manner, the work will be done easily, speedily, and beyond expectation. The success, which would richly have repaid the labours of many years, shall crown one sermon; and believers shall grow as rapidly in grace, as converts are made to the Lord. Thus in the days of the apostles, "as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children;" "a nation" seemed to be "born in a day:" and the Lord is still able so to influence the hearts of men, that whole kingdoms shall at once, without labour or difficulty, welcome, profess, and adorn the gospel. The time of this deliverance of Zion approaches; and "he who bringeth to the birth, will give strength to bring forth." Let us then say, in admiring faith, "Who hath heard or seen such things!" and not fail to shew our sympathy with the church in her sorrows, by pleading continually for her joyful deliverance. Then shall we assuredly rejoice in her joy, and partake of her consolations. And even now, if we diligently attend on the ordinances of God, and desire and seek for "the sincere milk of the word that we may grow thereby," we shall "suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;" especially if we carefully avoid whatever may prevent our "furtherance and joy of faith." Let us then renounce the vain pleasures of the world and of sin, that we may experience these pure and satisfying joys; and we shall soon be delighted with all the splendour and glory of the church triumphant.—In other possessions, as the number of proprietors increase, the value to each is diminished; but the privileges and felicity of all Christians is enhanced, by every accession of converts to Christ. There is also abundant provision made for the tending and nourishing up of the weakest of Zion's children, who shall "suck the breasts of her consolations, be carried on her “sides, or dandled on her knees:” yea, the Lord himself will comfort them through all their tribulations, in such tender love as no human affection can possibly equal, or imagination conceive. (Note, xlix. 14—16.) But nothing tends more to the true Christian’s comfort, than the peace and prosperity of the church. When the honourable of the earth resort to her; believers, as her dutiful sons, rejoice heartily, and flourish like herbs in well watered gardens.

Whenever the Lord powerfully appears for his church; he displays his indignation against his adversaries. Thus the increase of believers, in the primitive times, was attended by tremendous judgments on the Jews: thus the future success of the gospel will be introduced by similar judgments on all opposers: and thus the final salvation of the righteous will be connected with vengeance on all the workers of iniquity. Then by the fire and sword of his indignation will he plead with all flesh, and the slain of the “LORD shall be many:” sinners of every description shall be consumed together; for “he knoweth their works and “their thoughts;” and he will “gather all nations and “tongues to see his glory.” (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46.) In the mean time, he has set his gospel as a sign unto us; and even in these distant isles he sends us his message of love, by those whom “Jesus hath delivered from “the wrath to come.” (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 18—21. 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.) We have heard his name and the report of his salvation: may he open our eyes to see his glory, that we may forward the promulgation of his gospel, and the declaration of that glory, to the nations which have never yet seen or heard it. May the Lord send forth multitudes of able, faithful ministers into all lands, who, by every means and in every way, may gather in his elect from the four quarters of the globe; that all its inhabitants may become members of his church on earth, and inherit his holy mountain, “to the praise of the glory of his grace:” that even from among the benighted Indians and Africans, Chinese, and the inhabitants of Japan, South America, and the islands in the Pacific Ocean, priests and Levites may be raised up to minister before him; and thus to diffuse his salvation further and wider, till “the earth be filled with “the knowledge of his glory, as the waters cover the sea.” —The Lord will surely maintain and prosper his cause. The heavens and earth which now exist, are indeed “re-served unto fire, to the day of judgment and perdition “of ungodly men:” but his new heaven and earth shall endure for ever; and so shall the name and seed of his believing people. Let us then hearken to his voice, attend on his ordinances, hallow his sabbaths, and keep his word. For all his enemies, whether they experience or escape his temporal judgments, shall perish: and we shall see all the ungodly “go away into everlasting fire, prepared for the “devil and his angels.” “Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between “him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not.” —If then “thy right hand,” or foot, or eye, “offend thee, “cut it off,” or “pluck it out;” for it is better to “enter “into life, with one eye, or hand, or foot; than having “two, to be cast into hell-fire, where their worm dieth not, “and the fire is not quenched,” and “they shall be an abhorring to all flesh.”

THE BOOK

OF THE

PROPHET JEREMIAH.

JEREMIAH (whose name signifies “The exaltation of JEHOVAH,”) entered upon the prophetical office about seventy years after the death of Isaiah; during which time the reigns of Manasseh and Amon had intervened, (Notes, 2 Kings xxi. 2 Chr. xxxiii,) and the first years of Josiah. The nation of the Jews was at that time almost wholly given up to idolatry and wickedness. A short revival indeed took place under Josiah: but the people were, in general, hypocrites in the professed reformation; so that they speedily relapsed into idolatry, and soon became ripe for divine judgments.—Jeremiah prophesied for above forty years preceding the Babylonish captivity, and for some time afterwards; and this book consists chiefly of abstracts from the several messages with which he was sent by God to the people: these are remarkable for being replete with plain and faithful reproofs, tender and affectionate expostulations, and awful denunciations of impending judgments. They are occasionally interspersed with narratives of the hard usage, with which the prophet met, and with historical records of national affairs. No exact order is observed in the arrangement of the different prophecies; and the labours of learned men, in classing them, according to the time when delivered, are not altogether satisfactory: but many of them are dated.—Jeremiah was a man of very tender spirit, and he endured many sorrows; but he seems to have been most affected by the miseries of his people, which he both predicted, and witnessed. Having seen the utter desolation of Jerusalem and Judah, he was carried into Egypt by the remnant of the Jews, who rebelliously fled thither: and there he continued to prophesy; till they were at length so enraged by his reproofs, that they stoned him to death, as it is credibly attested by several ancient writers.—A large proportion of Jeremiah’s predictions were accomplished during his life-time, or soon after his death: all those, for instance, which related to the desolations of Jerusalem and Judah, and the adjacent countries, by the Chaldeans; and the return of the Jews from Babylon at the end of seventy years. These, in the way of argument and evidence, were most conclusive to his contemporaries, and the immediately succeeding generations; especially, as the want of historical records renders us unable, in many cases, to explain the prophecies, except from the sacred narrative. But several of this prophet’s predictions relate to more remote ages, and some have not yet been fulfilled.—When proud Babylon was at the height of her prosperity, he foretold, not only that the Medes and Persians should prevail against her, but also that she should sink and rise no more; (li. 63, 64;) which has received a most remarkable accomplishment. He predicted also the abolition of the ritual law, and the union of Israel and Judah in one faith; and the conversion of all nations; (Notes, iii. 16—19. xxi. 31—34;) the dispersion of the Jews, and their preservation as a distinct people in their dispersions, which has been fulfilled to this day; (Notes, xxx. 10, 11. xli. 27, 28;) the calling of the gentiles; (Notes, iv. 1, 2. xvi. 19—21;) the destruction of idolatry; (Note, x. 11;) and the person and kingdom of Christ, with the introduction of a new dispensation, and exceedingly great and permanent prosperity to the cause of religion; with clear declarations concerning the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land. (Notes, xxiii. xxxiii.)—The comment will shew, that this statement is well founded: yet nothing could appear more improbable, when Jeremiah wrote, than many of the events which he predicted; and it is undeniable that his prophecies have been most wonderfully accomplished.—It appears, that Jeremiah’s reputation as a prophet, was very high among the Jews, in the time of our Saviour: for when the people were divided in opinion who Jesus was; some supposed him to be Elijah, and others Jeremiah.—His prophecies are repeatedly quoted in the New Testament, as “the oracles of God;” and thus receive the most unreserved sanction of the apostles and evangelists. (Compare xxxi. 15. Matt. ii. 17, 18.—vi. 16. Matt. xi. 29.—ix. 23, 24. 1 Cor. i. 29—31.—xxxi. 31—34. Heb. viii. 8—13. x. 15—17.) These last references are peculiarly important; for in the one of them, God himself is mentioned as speaking the words referred to; and in the other it is said, “Whereof the Holy Ghost is a witness to us.” This is decisive, as to the judgment of the inspired apostles, respecting the book on which we now enter; and is peculiarly suited to put us upon our guard against those professed friends of the scriptures, who speak of these books, as venerable, authentick, or genuine remains of antiquity, of great value and high authority; but hesitate to vindicate them as divinely inspired.—A great part of this book is supposed to be poetry: and though Jeremiah is thought inferior to Isaiah in sublimity; (which may perhaps be owing to the different circumstances in which they lived, and the different subjects on which they treated;) yet it must be allowed, that he is admirably pathetic, his descriptions of approaching judgments are peculiarly vivid; and his eloquence is very vigorous and impressive, when inveighing against the shameless audacity of the people in rebellion against God.—It is generally allowed, that the last chapter was added after Jeremiah’s death; perhaps by Ezra. It is not known who arranged his prophecies in their present order, or by what means it has occurred, that the arrangement appears so irregular and perplexed.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Jeremiah, being of the family of Aaron, would have been an ordinary teacher of the people, if he had not been called to his extraordinary office: and the priestly and prophetic character were combined in him; as in Ezekiel and in John the Baptist. Some think that he was the son of Hilkiah the high priest, who found the book of the law in the temple: (Note, 2 Kings xxii. 8—11:) but, as no intimation is given of this in the subsequent history, the opinion is not at all probable.—Anathoth was about three miles distant from Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. c.) Jeremiah was appointed to prophesy just after Josiah had effectually begun his reformation: and great things might have been expected from the united efforts of such a king and such a prophet, both young, and likely to continue long to be useful to the nation: yet their zealous labours aggravated the guilt, and thus accelerated the ruin, of their incorrigible countrymen. Jeremiah prophesied forty years before the expulsion of the Jews from the promised land; as Moses had prophesied forty years previous to their entrance into it; but with a very different effect.—Fifth month. (3) Note, Zech. vii. 2, 3, v. 3.

V. 4. 'This seems to have been a visible appearance of the divine majesty, ... by the Son of God, or the second Person of the blessed Trinity. ... Gen. xviii. 2. Josh. v. 13. Ez. i. 26. Dan. viii. 15, 18. x. 6, 10.' Lowth. (Note, 9, 10. Is. vi. 1—4.)

V. 5. The Lord foreknew Jeremiah before he was formed in the womb; and gave him his being for the purpose of making him a prophet to Israel, and to other nations: he separated him, by his fixed determination for this work, before his birth; and perhaps made him partaker of the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, even in his mother's womb. And he let him know this his appointment, that he might prepare for the work assigned him, and apply himself to it. (Notes, Judg. xiii. 2—5. Is. xlix.

1, 2. Luke i. 11—17. Acts ix. 15, 16, v. 15. Gal. i. 15—24, v. 15.)—'This favour is expressed by knowing him, or 'taking special notice of him: as if a prince should single out one particular person out of a multitude, and call him by name, and appoint him to some honourable office or trust. So God expresses the peculiar favour he had to Moses, by saying, "I know thee by name," Ex. xxxiii. 12, 17. The same thing is likewise expressed by God's "sanctifying him," or setting him apart for the prophetic office. ... John x. 36.' Lowth. (Notes, Ex. xxxiii. 12—17. Is. xlv. 1—6. Acts xv. 13—18, v. 18. Rom. viii. 29—31. 2 Tim. ii. 19. Heb. x. 28—31, v. 29.) Jeremiah did not only prophesy concerning the Jews, and Israelites; but also the Egyptians, Babylonians, Moabites, and other nations. (Notes, xxv. xvi—li.)

V. 6—8. The prophet would have declined, at least for the present, the service to which he was called. He was young and inexperienced; (Notes, 1 Kings iii. 5—14. 1 Chr. xxii. 2—5, v. 5;) he did not consider himself as competent to so arduous and important an office; and he especially thought himself defective in the capacity of speaking with fluency and pertinency, or with that boldness and presence of mind which were requisite. (Notes, Ex. iii. 11—13. iv. 10—14. vi. 12.) This hesitation, though it arose from humility, and a proper sense of the greatness of the work, was alloyed with a mixture of unbelief, and a timid reluctance to the perils and hardships, to which he might be exposed. The Lord therefore over-ruled his objection, and ordered him not to say that he was a child: for he would embolden and strengthen him to address all to whom he sent him, and give him utterance to speak all that he commanded him: he ought therefore to dismiss his fears, and rest assured that God would be with him to defend and deliver him. (Notes, Matt. x. 19, 20. xxviii. 19, 20, v. 20. Luke xii. 11, 12. xxi. 12—19, v. 15. Acts iv. 29—31. vi. 9—14, v. 10.)—The word translated "a child" is used with great latitude in scripture; and frequently signifies one who has arrived at full maturity: so that we cannot from it determine any thing concerning the age of Jeremiah, when he entered on his prophetical office: though the number of years, during which he executed the prophetical office, shews, that he must at this time have been young.—‘To reprove the faults of all persons, the great men of the world, as well as those of lower degree, with that plainness and impartiality which the prophets used, requires a more than ordinary degree of courage. ... Deut. xxxi. 8. Josh. i. 9. Ez. ii. 6. iii. 9.’ Lowth.

V. 9, 10. This seems to have been an appearance of the personal Word, in human form, anticipating his incarnation. (Notes, 4. John i. 18.) JEHOVAH put forth his hand, and by touching Jeremiah’s mouth signified, that he would “give him a mouth and wisdom, which all his adversaries should not be able to gainsay or resist.” (Notes, 6—8. Is. vi. 5—7. li. 15, 16.) Thus he gave him commission, and authority over the nations, not to rule or make war against them, but to denounce the judgments of God upon them; and these judgments would be so certainly executed, according to his word, that he might be said “to root them out, and throw them down, &c.” (Note, xviii. 7—10.) He was also to declare the Lord’s mercies and salvation to his people, which would be effectual to build and to plant them. It may likewise mean, that the tendency of the prophet’s ministry would be, to repress the idolatry and wickedness of the heathen, and to promote the knowledge of God and true religion among them: and the desolations to be wrought in some of those nations, which had most obstinately opposed the cause of God, would make way for the planting and building of others in their places, who would be more favourable to it. (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—‘The prophets are said to do things, when they declare God’s purpose of doing them. Thus Ezekiel ... was sent to “destroy the city;” (Ez. xliii. 3;) that is to prophesy concerning its destruction. And Isaiah was commanded to “make the heart of the Jews fat,” that is, to foretel their obduration and incredulity. (Is. vi. 10.)’ Lowth. (Notes, Is. vi. 9, 10. Ez. xliii. 2—5.)—It may also be added, that God foresaw that the Jews and others would unto me ‘the second time, saying, f Gen. xli. 32. What seest thou? And I said, g I see 2 Cor. xiii. 1, 2. a seething pot; and the face thereof is Ez. xi. 3. xxiv 3—14. * toward the north. * Heb. from the face of the north.

15 For, lo, ⁱ I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the LORD; and they shall come, and ^j they shall set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem, and against all the walls thereof round about, ^k and against all the cities of Judah. + Heb. be opened i v. 15. vi. 22. x. 22 25 xxv. 9 28. 31, 32. xxxix. 3. xliii. 10. Is. xxii. 7.

16 And ^l I will utter my judgments against them, touching all their wick-aggravate their past guilt, and even bring down on themselves both spiritual and temporal judgments, by hardening their hearts against the warnings and exhortations of his prophets. And thus the very messages, which, if properly received, would have been the means of their preservation, eventually accelerated and enhanced their punishment. (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 15—17.)

V. 11, 12. This vision of a rod of the almond-tree, which is more forward in the spring than any other tree, represented the speedy approach of the judgments predicted against the Jews, and other nations; and was an apt emblem of the prophet’s mission, who lived to witness the accomplishment of more of his own predictions, than any other prophet did.

An almond-tree. (11) שֶׁקֶר, from שָׁקַר, to hasten.—שָׁקַר, hastening; 12.—‘Not only the nature of the almond-tree, but the very sound of the Hebrew word that signifies it, denotes God’s hastening to fulfil the prophecies which Jeremiah uttered by his directions.’ Lowth.

V. 13, 14. By another emblem, the Lord shewed Jeremiah what was to be the grand subject of his ministry, namely, the destruction of his people by the king of Babylon, whose dominions lay northward of Judea. Jerusalem was represented to him, by a pot, or caldron, boiling, or pouring out steam, as placed over a large fire: for the city was all in commotion, and about to be emptied by that fiery indignation which distressed it. (Note, Gen. xv. 17.) The face of this seething pot was towards the north: the place under the caldron, which was opened to receive the fuel, by which the fire was kept up, faced the north; by which the Lord instructed the prophet, that out of the north an evil should break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land. (Notes, iv. 5—7. Ez. xi. 1—12. xxiv. 1—13.)

V. 15. The king of Babylon would invade Judea, and encamp against Jerusalem, not alone, but attended with all those kings and nations, who were his allies, or vassals, and who chiefly inhabited the countries still more to the north of Judea than Chaldea was. (Notes, xxxiv. 1—5, v. 1. xliii. 8—13, v. 10. l. 41, 42.)

V. 16. Jeremiah would especially be employed, in so-edness, ^m who have forsaken me, ⁿ and have burned incense unto other gods, and ^o worshipped the works of their own hands.

17 Thou therefore ^p gird up thy loins, and arise, ^q and speak unto them all that I command thee; ^r be not dismayed at their faces, ^s lest I ^t confound thee before them.

V. 17—19. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) God commands the prophet instantly to undertake the office he designed him for, and to discharge it with courage and presence of mind. ... The Hebrew word is the same in both parts of the sentence, which may literally be rendered thus, "Be not confounded at their faces, ... lest I confound thee before them." ... They shall no more be able to prevail against thee, than they could against an impregnable wall or fortress.' Lowth.—The Lord thus called on his servant to expect the most violent opposition, from the kings and all the most powerful persons in the land; that he might understand the nature of the service, and be prepared accordingly: (Marg. Ref. u, x.) but such express promises of protection, support, and deliverance were added, as were fully sufficient for his encouragement. He seems, however, afterwards on some occasions, to have greatly lost sight both of the warnings and the promises. (Notes, xv. 19—21. xvii. 15—18. xx. 10—18.)

Lest I, &c. (17) "Be not thou afraid of them, lest I should suffer thee to be crushed before them." There is no threat implied here. ... The particle ^p points out the danger which might possibly alarm the prophet's tears, that of being overborne by the opposition he was likely to meet with. He therefore receives special assurances of God's immediate protection and support.' Blayney.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The Lord raises up and qualifies proper instruments for his work, in every age and circumstance of his Church: and when their labours fail to reform degenerate nations, they prove useful to individuals, and leave others without excuse.—He, who formed us in the womb, knew before-hand for what services or purposes he intended us: and if we desire to serve him, he will qualify us for all which he has for us to do or suffer in this world, and carry us through it. But except he "sanctify" us by his new creating Spirit, we shall neither be fit for his holy service on earth, nor his holy happiness in heaven. This is a most invaluable mercy, whenever it is vouchsafed; but the earlier in life, the happier for us and for others: and as the Lord sometimes sanctifies even infants, parents may be encouraged to pray for this blessing on their offspring, even from their conception in the womb.—He, who gives grace, can alone efficaciously ordain men to be his ministers. (Note, John xv. 12—16.) In general, young persons are not so proper for the discharge of this sacred office, in important stations and difficult times, as their seniors; and a modest diffidence arising from conscious unworthiness and inability, is a more favourable token, than self-confidence and a hasty eagerness to be employed. (Note, 1 Tim. iii. 6.) Yet the Lord may please to call one, who is a child in years and experience, and apparently of inferior endowments: in this case he will surely make it evident that it is his call; he will over-rule all objections, and remove all impediments; he will encourage his servant against dejection, as arising from the concurring influence of humility, and weakness of faith; and also against the fear of man: and he will bear him out in all to which he commissions him; he will "give him a mouth and wisdom, which all his adversaries shall not be able to gainsay or resist;" and will be with him in every work, in which he engages according to the instructions given him.—Whatever the wise men and politicians of the world may suppose or devise, the safety of kingdoms is decided, according to the purpose and word of God; and it greatly depends on the reception which is given to his faithful ministers. When their labours are unsuccessful, and their prayers return into their own bosom: and when they are persecuted, injured, and driven away, nations ripen apace for judgments "to root up and destroy" them. But when they are protected and prospered, when their prayers are answered, and the number of true believers is greatly increased; there will be more and more, by their prayers, examples, and exertions, to check the progress of impiety and iniquity; and thus faithful ministers are useful "to build, and to plant;" and to prolong the external prosperity of the community, as well as to promote the salvation of souls.

V. 11—19.

If we would speak in the name of God with propriety decision, holy fortitude, and meekness, we must observe attentively his word and works, and study his providence as well as his precepts; this will bring us acquainted with

CHAP. II.

GOD reminds Judah and Israel of his former kindnesses; and expostulates with them on their ungrateful, unreasonable, and unexampled apostasies and idolatries, 1—13. Their calamities originate from their crimes, 14—19. Their conduct is a breach of solemn engagements; degeneracy from their pious ancestors; undeniable, and inexcusable; the effect of impetuous lusts, and desperately persisted in, 20—30. It is connected with folly and wearying labour, murder and persecution, useless self-justification, and continual changes from one false confidence to another, 31—37.

MOREOVER ^a the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

“the signs of the times,” and direct our labours and prayers: (1 Chr. xii. 32.—Note, Matt. xvi. 1—4:) and though our services are all imperfect and defiled; yet God will graciously shew his approbation of all which we do well, according to our measure: and we should thus candidly accept of the well-meant services of each other.—The destruction of the wicked, and the salvation of the righteous, are ripening apace: in both respects the Lord will “hasten his word to perform it.” (Notes, Rom. xiii. 11—14, v. 11, 12. 2 Pet. ii. 1—3, v. 3.) This ministers must boldly declare, according to all which God commands them. They should therefore gird up their loins, and without delay address themselves to their work: they ought to expect enmity and opposition from numbers, whose sins they reprove and whose doom they denounce: but they need not be dismayed at their stout, frowning, or menacing countenances; and they must not yield to unbelieving fears of man, lest the Lord should put them to shame before their enemies, and employ others to carry his messages. He will protect such as simply follow and trust in him, against every assault of the wicked, as far as is good for them: he can make the feeblest and most timid, firm and immoveable as “an iron pillar,” and secure as a city defended by “brazen walls,” though whole nations should combine against them. We should then pray for fortitude and constancy in every temptation; and that these may be connected with prudence, meekness, humility, love, and a willingness to recede from every personal interest or inclination; whilst nothing must be allowed to move us from our place and duty. (Note, Rom. xv. 1—3.) If men do not prevail against us, to render us unfaithful, negligent, or angry; they cannot greatly hurt us, however they may fight against us. But as there is no respect of persons with God; and kings, princes, and even priests, often need reproof and admonition, as much, nay far more, than others: so they, who are called to this most arduous and perilous service will need, and may expect, peculiar supports, encouragement, and protection; that “as their day is, so may their strength be.”

CHAP. II. V. 2, 3. Jeremiah, now about to open his publick ministry, was ordered to “cry in the ears of Jerusalem:” to proclaim his message in the most publick places of the city; (Prov. i. 20, 21. viii. 1—3;) and to assure the inhabitants, that the Lord remembered the nation of Israel, and those events, which had taken place from the calling of Abraham, to the departure of his posterity out of Egypt, which might be called the youth of the nation; and the solemn transactions that had taken place at mount Sinai, which were as their espousals to God. “The kindness of” Israel’s “youth, and the love “of their espousals,” may signify Israel’s professed love and zeal for him and his worship. They readily followed the Lord out of Egypt, and on the banks of the Red Sea they sang his praises: they cheerfully and unreservedly acceded to the covenant at Sinai: and though they were guilty of many rebellions and provocations, yet they did not utterly renounce his worship, and pertinaciously set up open idolatry, as they did in after ages. (Notes, Ex. xv. 1—21. xxiv.) So that, in some sense, Israel might then be called “holiness to the LORD,” his worshippers, and the first-fruits of that harvest of believers, which he intended afterwards to reap from among men: and, considering the nation as immediately dedicated to him, he openly shewed, that he was deeply offended with all those who attempted to injure them, and would punish them for sacrilegiously presuming to devour his portion. Yet JEHOVAH’S mercy and kindness to Israel, in thus taking them for his people and entering into covenant with them seems rather to have been intended. “I have called to mind in “thy behalf the kindness shewn thee in thy youth, the “love of thy espousals.”...The kindness was all shewn “on the part of God, and was perfectly gratuitous, as the “word חסד properly signifies; and it was his affection for “them, and not their’s for him, that led him to espouse “them, that is, to engage in a special contract with them “to be their God, and to take them for his peculiar people. “And thus the words are explained in the margin of our “ancient English Bible (1583 folio) to be “that grace and “favour, which I shewed thee from the beginning, when “I did first choose thee to be my people, and married “thee to myself.” Blayney. (Notes, Ex. xix. 5, 6. Deut. vii. 6—8. ix. 4—6. Ez. xvi. 2—14. xx. 5—26.)—The last clauses should be rendered, “did offend...evil did come “upon them;” referring to the judgments which had been executed on Egypt, Amalek, and other nations, who opposed or assaulted Israel. (Notes, Ex. xiv. xvii. 8—16. Num. xxi. 1—3. Ps. cv. 8—36.)

V. 8, 9. 'The priests, whose office it was to instruct others in their duty, were ignorant or regardless of it themselves: and this was the principal reason of that degeneracy of manners which prevailed among the people.' Lowth.—The Scribes, who undertook to expound the scriptures, did not understand them. (Note, Ezra vii. 6—10.) The pastors, or rulers, civil and ecclesiastical, led the people into rebellion by example and influence: (Notes, v. 30, 31. Is. lvi. 9—12:) and even the prophets, or extraordinary teachers, who professed to be divinely inspired, taught the people to commit idolatry. (Notes, xxiii. 9—32. Ez. xliii. 1—16. xiv. 9—11. xxii. 24—28. Mic. iii. 8—12.) This concurrence of all orders in wickedness provoked God, to plead with, to judge, convict, condemn, and punish the nation, and their remote posterity; who would be induced, in the natural course of things, to imbibe the corrupt principles, and copy the bad examples, of their progenitors. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ex. xx. 5.)

V. 10—12. The Greeks, Romans, Arabians, and other inhabitants of the western or eastern regions, adhered tenaciously to the gods and religion of their fathers: though their idols were helpless and worthless, they would not change them; which would appear, in proportion as the fact should be investigated. Yet Israel, whose peculiar glory and happiness it was, to worship the self-existent, all-sufficient, eternal, and most holy and glorious JEHOVAH, the Creator of heaven and earth, were ready at all times to change their God and religion, for dumb idols and abominable superstitions, which tended to their disgrace and ruin! Well indeed might "the heavens be astonished" at this senseless and hateful ingratitude, and appear as in a horrible consternation, and withdraw their light, in token of grief, and abhorrence of such enormous guilt.

19 Thine ^f own wickedness shall correct thee, and ^g thy backslidings shall reprove thee; know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and ^h bitter, that thou hast forsaken the LORD thy God, ⁱ and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord God of hosts.

V. 14—19. The prophet seems here to allude to the case of the ten tribes. Was Israel born a slave in the family of some idolater? if not, why was he spoiled by the gentiles, and reduced to the basest bondage? (Note, Is. i. 1—3, v. 1.) The Assyrian princes, like young lions, had roared and prevailed against him, and desolated his land: and the inhabitants of Noph and Tahapanes, cities of Egypt, had destroyed his glory and strength. Yet this may be a prophetick intimation of the death of Josiah, when engaged against Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, and of the dethroning and captivity of Jehoahaz by the same prince. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. xxiv. 1—7. 2 Chr. xxxv. 20—27.)

The Israelites had brought all these calamities upon themselves, by apostatizing from God, and departing from the way in which he led them. And what business had they in Egypt, or in Assyria? Did they still prefer the waters of Sihor, (that is, the Nile,) or those of Euphrates, to “the Fountain of living waters?” (Notes, 13. Is. xxiii. 3. xxvii. 12, 13.) Could such carnal confidences, and idolatrous connexions, tend more to their good, than a simple dependence on God, and devotedness to him? They would therefore find these revolts from him to be the sources of misery: for by giving strangers admission among them, they brought themselves into a dependence on them, which ended in their ruin: and they were thus taught, that to sin against God was a bitter, as well as an evil thing, as destructive of their comfort, as contrary to their duty; and that he was more to be feared than their strongest enemies. (Marg. Ref. c—h.) “The miseries that your own sins have brought upon you, are a sufficient instruction to you, to break off your evil courses, and to return to God by a sincere repentance.” Lowth.—Broken the crown, &c. rulers and teachers of every description, shunned detection, like a thief: and yet they would certainly be detected and put to shame; for the Lord would prove against them, that they had ascribed divine honours to senseless idols, and worshipped them, addressing them by the title of father, and saying, "Thou hast begotten me," (Marg.—Notes, Is. xlv. 9—20. Hab. ii. 18, 19,) as if they had been the authors of their existence, and of all their comforts. But, though they thus turned their backs on JEHOVAH, in their approaching troubles they would call upon him to save them: but he would then send them to their idols to seek deliverance: (Notes, Judg. x. 10—14. 2 Kings ii. 13, 14:) yet they would not obtain any help from them, though they were become as numerous as the cities and towns in all Judah.—'Every ... city had its peculiar deity, after the manner of the heathen. 2 Kings xvii. 30, 31. Hos. viii. 11. x. 1.' Lowth. (Note, Hos. x. 1—3.)—And why should they attempt to plead their cause against God, or to expect the performance of his promises to the nation; when they had forfeited all their privileges by idolatry and iniquity, and when they were all involved in this national transgression, which violated their covenant? He had indeed long exercised patience towards them; he had corrected them in his providence, and warned them by his prophets: but they had not derived benefit from his corrections; (Notes, v. 3—6. Is. i. 5, 6;) and by murdering his prophets, as a fierce lion devours the prey, they had filled up the measure of their iniquities. V. 31, 32. If the Jews would not diligently attend to the word of God, they must prepare to see it, as accomplished before their eyes, even in that very generation. Could they say that the LORD had been to them as a wilderness, or a land of darkness and distress? (Notes, xiii. 15—17. Is. v. 26—30. viii. 21, 22.) On the contrary it was plain, that they uniformly had prosperity and abundance of comforts, when they adhered to his service. Why then should they desire to renounce his authority, and set up for their own masters, and affect independence? (Notes, 10—13. Gen. iii. 4, 5. Ps. xii. 1—4.) Why should they determine to come no more to him, from whom they had received so many pledges of love, and valuable blessings? Even the virgin was used to set far more store by her ornaments, or the bride by her nuptial garments or jewels, than Israel did by his relation to God, and all the honour, privilege, and happiness connected with it! Nay, they had forgotten him through alienation of heart, and dislike to retain him in their knowledge; and this for days which could not be numbered. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)

V. 33—37. God next enquired of the people, why they imitated harlots, who used every artifice to allure, and turned every way to meet, the companions of their shameful amours; (Notes, Prov. vii. 6—23. Hos. ii. 2—7;) for thus the Jews assiduously employed themselves in devising and embracing new idolatries. (Note, iii. 1—3.) They not only became acquainted with the worst practices

CHAP. III.

God invites Judah to return to him, with intimations of mercy; but with rebukes and expostulations, 1—5. Israel, though rejected for sin, is less criminal of the heathens, but refined upon them, and became teachers of professed idolaters in these infamous mysteries. (Notes, Ez. xvi. 44—51.)—The word, rendered “trim-mest,” is literally, makest good, which some understand of the plausible excuses which they made for their conduct; though they were so notoriously wicked.—They had also shed the innocent blood of their children whom they sacrificed to Moloch; (Notes, vii. 31. Ps. cvi. 35—38;) of the prophets who reprov'd them for their sins; of the Lord's decided worshippers; and by cruel oppression of the poor: and these abominations were not committed in secret or carefully concealed; but the marks of them were evidently to be seen on the skirts of their garments, and their guilt defiled every thing they did. (30. Notes, Ez. xxii. 2—12. 26—30. xxiv. 6—8.) Yet they would still persist in justifying themselves; and they had a presumptuous confidence in God, as if he were, or soon would be, reconciled to them. (9. 23. 29.) But he would “enter into judgment with them,” or “denounce sentence against” them, on that very account: for, in saying that they had not sinned, they affronted the God of truth in the grossest manner. (Note, 1 John i. 8—10.)—It was also undeniable, that they had not renounced their idolatrous connexions and confidences, but now expected help from Egypt, as they formerly had done from Assyria; and resembled an adulterous woman, who gads about from one paramour to another. Therefore the Lord was determined to put them to shame; and they should go forth from Pharaoh, with every expression of disconsolation: nay, they should go into captivity in the deepest distress and anguish: for the Lord reprobated, and rejected with abhorrence, all their confidences, and had determined never to prosper them in their evil ways.—The alliances of the Jews with Assyria had always proved ruinous and disgraceful: and the Egyptians slew Josiah, carried Jehoahaz prisoner into Egypt, and utterly disappointed all the expectations of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxxvii. 1—10. 2 Kings xxiv. 7. Lam. iv. 17. Ez. xvii. 15—21.)

Poor innocents, &c. (34) “The blood of the lives of “the innocent poor.” This is a more literal translation.—Whatever be a man's character before God; if he be put to death without legal authority, or when not deserving of it, according to equitable human laws; his blood is innocent blood, in the language of scripture: and the blood of children sacrificed to idols was only a part of the aggregate guilt of innocent blood chargeable on the Jews. (Notes, 26—30. xix. 4, 5.)—By secret search.] “By digging.” Marg. Comp. Lev. xvii. 13. Ez. xxiv. 7.—Upon all these.] “Upon every oak.” Blayney. That is, near which human sacrifices were offered.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The Lord will in one way or other, remind every man of all the favours, which he has conferred on him from his youth; and of all his professions of faith and love, than Judah, who had not profited by the judgments inflicted on Israel, 6—11. Both are called to repentance, with gracious promises and predictions, 12—19. The people being sharply reprov'd, are prophetically represented, as repenting and confessing their sins, 20—25.

since he first heard of his name and salvation.—It is very desirable and honourable to be early numbered among his worshippers, and admitted to those sacred ordinances, which are as the solemn espousals of the soul to God our Saviour. (Note, Cant. iii. 11.) Yet numbers on such occasions express much zeal and love, and appear ready to follow him through every trial and difficulty; who afterward give cause to suspect, that their affections were indeed moved, while their hearts were not changed; and that they “had no root in themselves, and therefore in “time of temptation fell away.” (Note, Matt. xiii. 20, 21.) Thus their profession of being “holiness to the LORD,” forms an additional reproach to their characters, and aggravation of their crimes. Yet some, who have fallen off after very promising beginnings, and who have run very wide in the ways of impiety or infidelity; have been recovered, and have “remembered the love of their first “espousals,” and their subsequent unfaithfulness, to their deeper humiliation before God, even to the end of their lives.—But, not hypocrites alone, and such persons as openly disgrace their profession, are criminal in these things: even true believers are often constrained to plead guilty. After having been delivered from the bondage of Satan, relieved in the hour of distress and dismay, conducted through many dangers and perplexities, and rendered comfortable in the hopes and earnestness of heavenly felicity; they have evidently made unsuitable returns for these immense obligations; and have declined from that zeal and love, which marked their first entrance on a religious course. We all ought therefore to examine ourselves in this respect, that we may “repent and do our “first works:” and we should be very careful, as we proceed in life, that we do not lose in zeal and fervency, what we gain in knowledge, prudence, and experience. (Note, Rev. ii. 2—5. P. O. 2—7.) They, however, who are indeed “holiness to the LORD,” and “the first fruits of his “creatures;” (Note, Jam. i. 16—18, v. 18;) and who are following him through this dreary wilderness, to the promised rest; experience such love from him, as richly compensates all that they can lose, leave, or suffer, for his sake: and the Lord will resent the wrong done to his children and friends, as if done to himself.—No apostate, or backslider, can give a good reason for “going far from “God:” none can charge him with unfaithfulness, injustice, or unkindness: and he may justly reproach them with folly, as well as ingratitude, in leaving such a tried and powerful Friend, to walk after vanity and become vain.—In nations, which have been most highly favoured with temporal deliverances and advantages, and with abundance of the means of grace, how grievously do men generally defile themselves and their land, and make the Lord's heritage an abomination!

V. 8—13.

Too often the ministers of religion are peculiarly criminal, when nations are filling up their measure of iniquity.

 Mic. ii. 10.

Men presume to officiate in holy things, without the spiritual knowledge of God, or earnest enquiry after him: they dare for lucre to handle the law, without any acquaintance with the Lawgiver; and to teach Christianity, while Christians themselves only in name, and ignorant of the nature of that holy religion: and thus pastors, and teachers, and rulers, by their example and doctrine, propagate iniquity, infidelity, and heresy, and harden the hearts of the numbers, who “walk after such things as cannot profit!” What will men of this character say, when the Lord shall plead against them? and how can they endure the thought of treasuring up judgments even for their children's children?—Men, who have been educated in any false religion, adhere tenaciously to it, and are hardly persuaded to change it, however absurd and unreasonable it be. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 17—21.) Thus Satan rivets the fetters of ignorance and delusion on men's minds, by means of their bigotry, prejudice, and pride, and relative attachments. But the professors of true religion have ever shewn a strange propensity, to change their glory for any worthless superstition or absurdity! so that the truth and spiritual worship of God cannot be maintained among men, without continual divine interpositions. This is most lamentable, and may well excite our grief and consternation: but our astonishment will be diminished, if we duly consider, “that the carnal mind is enmity against God,” and must therefore naturally prefer any gross, or sensual, or jovial worship, and proud self-exalting reasonings, and absurd superstitions, or fanatical delusions, to the holy character and precepts, the humbling truths, and spiritual worship, of JEHOVAH. (P. O. Ex. xxxii. 1—14.) Indeed we all have committed, and are still prone to commit, the two evils of which Israel was proved guilty, even apostasy from God, and idolatrous love of some created object, or objects, from which we seek and expect our felicity. How do we forsake the pure joys to be found in the favour and service of God, for the polluting and wasting pleasures and interests of the world and sin! How apt are we to refuse the glorious salvation of Christ, and to prefer our own foolish ways of recommending ourselves to our offended Creator! How prone are we to forsake the unerring word of God, to follow human teachers, and the traditions of men! and to forego the consolations of the Holy Spirit, for the worthless joys of the enthusiast and hypocrite! With great labour do men frame and resort to these and many other broken cisterns; instead of “drawing with joy the waters of life from the wells of salvation.” Thus man became, and thus unbelievers continue, the slaves of sin and Satan, and persisting in this course must remain so for ever.

V. 14—24.

The professed people of God are often reduced to a base and ruinous subjection to their own lusts; and by the wrath of God, to various cruel oppressors. But what has a Christian to do, in the ways of forbidden pleasure and vain dissipation, or in the pursuits of avarice or ambition? Can the waters of these rivers be equal to those of “the River, the streams of which make glad the city of God?”

(Note, Ps. xli. 4.) If men will thus turn aside, their backslidings will correct them, and they will learn the evil of their conduct, by the bitterness of its consequences, that they may be taught to “be in the fear of the LORD all the day long.”—The history of the world, and of the church, and that of every man, (believer or unbeliever,) proves the total depravity of the human heart: no obligations, professions, pious ancestors, good education, or external means, can ensure any man's continuance in the ways of godliness: no ingenuity or eloquence can extenuate this matter: though men “wash themselves with nitre and take much soap,” yet their iniquities are marked before God, and will demonstrate their depravity, when produced against them at the day of judgment. The fact is evident and very affecting, that the descendants of the most pious men, who seem to be “planted a noble vine, wholly a right seed,” have in many cases degenerated, and become hardened infidels or profligates.—But a disposition to self-justification is strongly marked as a feature of man's character: when his criminality cannot be denied, he will vindicate or excuse it; and if he can plead not guilty as to a few gross outward wickednesses, he will deem this a compensation for all other offences: nay, a short-lived, reluctant abstaining from habitual sin, shall be pleaded as an atonement for all former gratifications, and even as an excuse for returning again to the commission of it, or indulgence and dispensation to do this! But when the Lord shall cause men to review their ways, and to know and see what they have done, “every mouth will be stopped, and all the world will be found guilty before him.” (Notes, Ez. xvi. 60—63, v. 63. Rom. iii. 19, 20.) Indeed they are often as much under the power of their lusts, and as regardless of consequences in gratifying their present inclinations, as the brute beasts; and as inaccessible to arguments, warnings, or motives, when urged against their impetuous cravings. It is vain in such cases to weary ourselves about them: the only hope is, that the painful effects of their vices will lead them to salutary reflection; or give some future opportunity of expostulating with them, and suggesting useful admonitions.

V. 25—37.

Sometimes despair of mercy, or of victory over domineering evil habits and lusts, leads men to as unrestrained indulgence, as the most presumptuous infidelity could do. They think that there is “no hope” for them, and as they have loved their sinful pleasures, they may as well go on in them as not. To this case the abundant mercy and almighty assistance, proposed in the gospel, form a suitable remedy; and indeed the only one, which is at all adequate to the awful case.—Sinners, of every rank and distinction must all stand before the Judge of the world; and most of them are conscious, that they cannot vindicate their conduct before him: then they will appear like the poor convict before the bar, on the day of his trial; when he stands to hear the ignominious sentence against him for his crimes. Even ungodly kings, princes, priests, and prophets will be thus put to shame before the assembled world:

and the unreasonableness of men's conduct, whether they have been idolatrous infidels, or profane and profligate, will as much shame their understandings, as their hearts. —It may be vain to expect help from God in the time of trouble, if we now turn our backs on him: yet many call upon him, when they think death at hand, who never before regarded him. As the Lord will not help the perishing sinner, who continues to the last impenitent; so all his other confidences will fail him, how many soever they may have been. This will be the awful case of those especially, who have hardened themselves against convictions and reproofs, and who have hated and persecuted such as have warned and instructed them.—Men do not forsake God, merely because they suppose his service unprofitable or injurious, or experience satisfaction in the ways of sin; but also because they are of a proud independent spirit, which scorns subjection and subordination, or to own their guilt and folly: and because they desire to be “lords,” they will come no more unto him.” In this manner they forsake their honour, privilege, interest, and happiness; and thus we all have too often, and too long, forgotten and neglected him.—Men may employ all their ingenuity and application in the cause of impiety; but they can find no happiness in it: they may teach other wicked ones their way, and thus be accessaries to their destruction; they may do much mischief, and thus “treasure up wrath against the day of wrath;” they may varnish the matter over with fair pretences, and shift from one sin to another, and seek safety and happiness by varied means: but confusion is their portion; “the LORD hath rejected their confidences, and they shall not prosper in them.” (Note, Is. 1. 10, 11.)

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. (Note, ii. 33—37.) The beginning of this chapter, in the original, seems to connect with the conclusion of the preceding. “In saying, if a man, &c.” God would never prosper his professed worshippers, while they proceeded in their evil courses: and this appeared, not only by his threatenings and judgments, but even by his calls to repentance and promises of mercy. For, in saying, ‘Return to me, and I will pardon thee, notwithstanding thy past atrocious crimes,’ he in effect said, that he would not otherwise pardon them. “In saying,” or “whilst thou sayest,” or acknowledged, that the law ‘of God (Deut. xxiv. 1—4,) forbids a man to take his wife again, whom he had divorced; and who had gone from him and engaged herself to another; even thou hast gone

‘from me, and hast had unlawful commerce with many ‘lovers. ... Yet after all this, I give thee liberty to return ‘to me, saith JEHOVAH.’ Blayney. To shew that his ways and thoughts are unspeakably above those of man; (Note, Is. lv. 8, 9;) God illustrates the subject from the law given by Moses; in which any one who had divorced his wife, was forbidden to take her back, if she had been married to another: (Note, Deut. xxiv. 1—4;) and it must be allowed, that such a conduct would introduce a community of wives, and greatly pollute the land where it was practised. Yet after all the idolatries committed by the Jews, the Lord could honourably, and would certainly, receive them to full favour, if they returned to him. (Notes, 12—15. ii. 20—24. Hos. ii. 10—17. iii. 1—3.)

V. 2, 3. The people might see the traces of their idolatries, on every high place on which they looked: they were continually devising new species of idolatry, and tempting others to it: even as the prostitute sits by the way to seduce the passengers; or as the Arabian robber waits in the desert for the traveller. (Marg. Ref. f, g, h.—Notes, Ez. xvi. 23—34. xxxiii. 1—35.) Thus they polluted the land by their abominable idolatries and crimes: and when the Lord visited them with drought or famine, they persisted in them with the most shameless effrontery. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Note, vi. 13—15, v. 15.) ‘The former rain... falls in ‘autumn, after the long summer’s drought: ... the latter ‘rain... generally comes about the middle of April: after ‘which it seldom or never rains during the whole summer. ‘... The former being absolutely necessary for seed-time; ‘and the latter for filling the ears of corn before the ‘harvest comes on.’ Blayney. Rain falls also in the winter months; but scarcely ever in the summer: so that the parched land could not be sown, without the former rain. (Notes, v. 20—25, vv. 24, 25. Joel ii. 21—24, v. 23. Am. iv. 7.)

V. 4, 5. Some interpret these verses as a reproof of the hypocrisy and presumption of the Jews. Notwithstanding their abandoned and obstinate wickedness, they would still call God their “Father and the Guide of their youth;” (Notes, 19. xxxi. 9. Ps. lxxi. 17, 18. Prov. ii. 17. Is. lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. 6—8;) the Friend, who had taken care of the nation from its infancy: and they presumed to expect help from him, though they continued to imitate the rebellious son, or the adulterous wife. (Notes, vii. 8—11. Is. xlviii. 1, 2. lviii. 1, 2.) Nor would they be induced to believe, that he would so reserve his anger for ever, as to bring his threatened judgments upon them: but they expected, that he would relent before matters

6 ¶ The LORD said also unto me, in the days of Josiah the king, Hast thou seen that which ^r backsliding Israel hath done? ^e she is gone up upon every high mountain, and under every green tree, and there hath ^t played the harlot.

7 And I said, after she had done all these things, ^u Turn thou unto me; but she returned not: and ^z her treacherous sister Judah saw it.

8 And I saw, ^y when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery, I had put her away, ^z and given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah ^a feared not, but went and played the harlot also.

9 And it came to pass through the ^{*} lightness of her whoredom, that ^b she defiled the land, and ^c committed adultery with stones and with stocks.

came to this extremity; though they were conscious, that they had spoken and done evil to the extent of their ability, and were not restrained from transgression by any other hindrance, than want of power and opportunity.—This is a probable interpretation; but the passage is more commonly understood in a contrary sense. Would not the people, from this time, (when they were warned, corrected, and invited to repentance, and favoured with a pious reforming king,) come and seek mercy from that God, who had always been the Father and Guide of Israel? Would they not intreat him again to take them under his fatherly guidance? Would they not do it immediately, without further delay? And would the Lord, in that case, reserve his anger for ever, and punish them to the end? (Notes, Ps. lxxvii. 5—12. lxxxix. 46—48. ciii. 9.) By no means: though they had done all in their power to provoke him, he was yet disposed to be merciful to them. (Notes, 1. ii. 2, 3.) ‘Thy behaviour has been in direct opposition to these kind admonitions: thou didst still persist in malicious wickedness, and by thy actions shewest the utmost hatred and despite against God and goodness.’ Lowth.

V. 6—11. A new message seems to be begun in this place, which probably was delivered after Josiah had made great progress in his reformation. The prophet was called on to take a retrospective view of the wickedness of Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes, which had apostatized, or turned away from God; and of the desolations which followed. The word “backsliding” seems to be taken from oxen, when they turned back, instead of drawing forward, in the yoke; and it is used for an individual, or a people, re-

11 And the LORD said unto me, ^e The backsliding Israel hath ^f justified herself more than treacherous Judah.

12 ¶ Go, and proclaim these words ^g toward the north, and say, ^h Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the LORD; ⁱ and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you: ^k for I am merciful, saith the LORD, and ^l I will not keep anger for ever.

13 Only ^m acknowledge thine iniquity, that thou hast transgressed against the LORD thy God, ⁿ and hast scattered thy ways to the strangers under every green tree, and ye have not obeyed my voice, saith the LORD.

14 Turn, ^o O backsliding children, saith the LORD, ^p for I am married unto you; and I will take you, ^q one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion:

nouncing the worship and service of God. Israel had utterly renounced the temple, and almost wholly forsaken the worship of God; and they had committed idolatry in every part of the land. The Lord had also sent Elijah, Elisha, and several other prophets to bring them back to him; but in general “they returned not.” The kingdom of Judah, descended from the same stock, was equally treacherous and unfaithful to the covenant of God with them, and they had witnessed all these transactions. At length God saw it necessary to put Israel away, as an adulterous woman; which he did by the kings of Assyria. (Notes, 1. 2 Kings xvii. 5—23. Is. 1. 1—3.) Yet Judah took not warning, and was not afraid to continue, and to grow even more impudent, in the most abominable and senseless idolatries. And after all that Judah had heard and witnessed of the long continued captivity and misery of Israel; the people in general did not fall in cordially with good Josiah’s reformation, but only “feignedly,” reluctantly, and hypocritically. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 33. Zeph. i. 1—8.) So that all things considered, Israel was not so inexcusable as Judah was become; for Judah had been favoured with many pious kings, had enjoyed far greater advantages than Israel, had been borne with in greater patience, and had the doom of Israel set before them as a warning; and all these circumstances aggravated their guilt. (Notes, Ex. xvi. 48—55. xxiii. 4—21. Matt. xi. 20—24.)

V. 12—15. The prophet was next ordered to proclaim his message toward the north, where the ten tribes were dispersed in captivity, in Assyria, Media, and other distant regions. The prophet did not go into those countries to preach to the Israelites: but this order was intended to shame the Jews, and it implied that mercy was in reserve for Israel. They were thus called on to repent of their idolatries, and return to the Lord: and he would no longer "cause his anger to rest upon them," being at all times disposed to mercy. They were exhorted to acknowledge that they had sinned against that God, whose professed and covenanted worshippers they had been; and that they had basely turned every way to seek out other objects of worship, which they preferred to him. (Notes, iv. 1, 2. Lev. xxvi. 40—42. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxx. 1—10. 1 Kings viii. 33, 34. Neh. i. 5—11, vv. 8, 9.) They were encouraged to repent and return to God, by an intimation that he still considered them as children, though rebellious; and as married to him, though adulterous; and that he had yet a favour towards them, on account of his ancient transactions with the nation. They were also to be assured, that he intended to take a small remnant of them, as one from the whole number of the inhabitants of a city, or two from a family, or subordinate division of a tribe; to bring them back to Zion, and place over them rulers and teachers like David; "men after his own heart," who should feed them wisely and prudently, or with divine knowledge and wisdom, which are the proper food of the soul. (Notes, Is. xxiv. 13—15. xxvii. 2—6, 12, 13. xxx. 20—26.) This was in part accomplished, when some of the Israelites returned with the Jews from Babylon, and were ruled and taught with them, by Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, Nehemiah, and others. But it refers to the gathering of the dispersed Israelites with the Gentiles, into the Christian church in the primitive times and in after ages; and to the future restoration of Israel.

I will not cause mine anger to fall, &c. (12) "I will not look down upon you with a lowering brow." ... Literally "I will not let my countenance fall upon you." So when Cain was wroth, it is said, that "his countenance fell." ... Gen. iv. 5. On the contrary, the lifting up of the countenance upon any person denotes favour and good-will towards him. Num. vi. 26. Blayney. (Notes, Num. vi. 24—26. Ps. iv. 6—8.)

V. 16—18. It is generally agreed, that the ark of the covenant was not found after the captivity, neither "was it made any more," and that nothing was substituted in its place: yet far more than this must be here intended. The ark was the chief symbol of the Lord's presence with Israel, the principal type of Christ, and the centre of the ritual law. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10—22.) The meaning therefore seems to be, that the whole of that dispensation was about to be abolished; which took place after the multitude of believers had been greatly increased, by the conversion of the Gentiles, and of the Israelites scattered among them. The strong attachment of the Jews to externals, and their reluctance to part with them, seem to be denoted. They could not be weaned from these "beggarly elements," till Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed: then the observance of them became impracticable, and the Jewish converts to Christ perceived that they were no longer of any value: and thus they sunk into disuse, and gradually into oblivion. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 3, 4. Matt. xxiv. 29—31. Acts vi. 9—14, v. 14. Gal. iv. 8—11.) At the same time the church, "the Jerusalem from above," became more glorious: (Notes, Gal. iv. 21—31. Heb. xii. 22—25:) the Lord openly reigned there as on his throne, all the nations were gathered before him to worship, and no longer followed the imaginations of their own evil hearts, in the worship of idols. In this happy state of the church, it is predicted that the Jews and Israelites would lay aside their ancient contests, cordially unite in the worship of God, and enjoy together the peculiar privileges of his people. (Notes, xxiii. 5, 6. xxx. 1—3, v. 3. xxxi. 1. 3—7. Is. xi. 11—16, v. 13. Hos. i. 11.)—As this is here introduced subsequent to the calling of the Gentiles, it evidently foretels the future calling of the tribes of Israel into the church, and their restoration to their own land.

"That in the latter days they shall actually return from their several dispersions, to dwell as a nation in their own land, is declared in such express terms by most of the ancient prophets, that there cannot be a doubt, I think, of its being literally accomplished in due time." Blayney. (Notes, xxx. 1—11. xxxi. 1—14. Is. ii. 2—5. xi. 11—16. lxvi. 19—23. Ez. xxxvii. 15—28. Hos. i. 8—11. iii. 4, 5.) "Whatever way we understand these promises, about the restoration of the Jews from captivity, or dispersion, it cannot annul the evidence of the chief predictions in view, viz. those relating to the abolishing of the ceremonial law, and the conversion of the Gentiles; begun by the calling or gathering in of many nations, and completed, by "the gathering of all nations to the name of the LORD." Maclaurin.

Neither shall it be done, &c. (16) "Neither shall it be made any more." ... The ark once lost was never to be made again. Blayney.

mountable, lay in the way of their accomplishment, arising from the deep guilt and depravity of the nation: for how could JEHOVAH, consistently with his justice and holiness, put such obstinate rebels among his children, and give them that pleasant and glorious land for their inheritance, which had been long possessed as an heritage by the nations and their armies? (Marg.—Dan. viii. 9, 10. Notes, Ez. xx. 5, 6. Dan. xi. 40—45. Luke xxi. 20—24, v. 24.) To this he answers, that he would bring them to repentance, faith, and prayer, and give them “the spirit of adoption,” the temper of dutiful children; and then they would call on him and fear him, and love him as their Father: (Notes, Deut. xxx. 1—10. Rom. viii. 14—17. Gal. iv. 4—7:) and that he would so influence their hearts by his grace, that they should no more depart from him. It is implied, that when this took place, he would cast out their enemies before them, as he had done when their fathers were first put in possession of Canaan. (Notes, xxxi. 31—34. xxxii. 37—41. Ez. xi. 14—20. xxxvi. 20—38. xxxix. 23—29. Zech. xii. 9—14.)
V. 20—25. This seems to be a prophetic representation of the manner, in which the change before mentioned would be effected. The Lord would convince the people of their wickedness, in treacherously departing from him. Then the voice of their lamentations and prayers would be heard, even in the places where their crimes had been perpetrated: and this open confession was necessary, as they had so perversely forsaken the way of obedience, and forgotten their God. He then graciously invites them to return to him, and he will both pardon their guilt and heal their backslidings; establishing their hearts and healing the diseases of their souls, by his sanctifying grace. Thus encouraged, they readily declare their purpose of immediately returning to the Lord, who had a right to their worship and service. (Notes, xxxi. 8, 9. 18—20. l. 4—6, v. 4. Lev. xvi. 40—42. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxx. 1—10. 1 Kings viii. 6—53. Is. xxvi. 12—18. Hos. xiv. 1—3.) They are now convinced that salvation, temporal or eternal, must be sought in vain from their idols or superstitions, and that it could only be had from the Lord. (Notes, Ps. xxvii. 1—3. l. 1, 2. 5—7. cxxi. 1, 2. Is. xlv. 15—17. 23—25. Hos. 6, 7.) They confess, that, for their sins, they had endured much disgrace and misery, having been violently robbed of their property, and bereaved of their children: they are now ashamed before God to reflect on their iniquities and idolatries, and those of their fathers, through all their generations: and, being thus penitent, they are reinstated in the family of God, and numbered among his children. (Notes, Is. lxiii. 7—19. lxiv. Ez. xvi. 60—63. xxxvi. 31, 32. Dan. ix. 4—19.)—Some expositors consider the word “shame,” as relating to the shameful idolatries of Israel; especially the worship of Baal; for this idol is sometimes called Bosheth, the word rendered shame: (Is. 13. marg. Hos. ix. 10. Note, Judg. vi. 31, 32:) but this exclusive interpretation is not at all necessary or proper. The present dispersed and disgraced state of the nation is evidently the punishment of crimes, entirely distinct from gross idolatry, from which the Jews have long been free, and the recovery of Israel as a nation, from this abject condition, seems especially predicted.

From her husband. (20) “Her friend.” Marg. Hos. iii. 1.—“מרה” seems to be the feminine of מרע, an evil doer, or wicked person, and is thus to be joined with מרה. “אש” “a wicked woman breaketh her faith.” Blayney.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.
The Lord is so “rich in mercy,” and has made such abundant provision for the honourable exercise of it; that he is ever ready to receive to full favour the vilest of transgressors: even when it would be contrary to the most approved rules of society, exactly to copy his example, in our conduct to those who grossly violate their relative obligations. But whilst he glorifies the abundance of his grace, by inviting rebels and apostates to return unto him; he will also bring their iniquities to remembrance: nor can any man expect the tokens of his favour, who is not humbled and ashamed on account of his sins, and in some proportion to their aggravations. If then we would escape rebukes, corrections, or ruinous judgments; we must judge ourselves, and examine, with minute exactness, all the sins which we remember to have committed, that we may condemn ourselves for them before God. In this frame of mind, the greatest transgressor may approach him as a kind Father and may plead with him all the favours; which he has bestowed, as the Creator, Preserver, and Saviour of men. All the mercies of God to his church in every age may suggest encouragement to the humble enquirer: and what can be so desirable for the young and inexperienced, in this ensnaring, perilous world, as to have the Lord Almighty for “their Father, and the Guide of their youth?” (Notes, Ps. cxix. 9. Ec. xii. 1. 2 Cor. vi. 14—18, v. 18.) Let young persons then daily and fervently pray for this mercy: and let parents direct and help their children in seeking it, and earnestly intreating God to bestow it on them. Let those, who have not hitherto begun to seek God, “from this time” begin to do it in good earnest: and if any have grown negligent in this important concern; let them, without delay and with their whole heart, return unto him.—But it will not avail the obstinate and hypocritical, to use the most excellent words, and to presume on external privileges, and their relation to God: or on his mercy; as if he would not execute his threatened vengeance, especially on those who call him Lord and Father, while they continue to “speak and do evil as they can.”—Alas! how plainly do many of us find, on an impartial review of our conduct, that we have had it in our hearts to do far more evil, than it was in our power actually to perpetrate: and that we should have made ourselves far more criminal and mischievous, if we had had more liberty, health, riches, ingenuity, or opportunity; or if we could have got over the fear of reproach, or punishment from man! And how few temptations, comparatively, have we resisted out of pure regard to God!—When we carefully mark the crimes of others, especially of such as break off from a religious profession, and despise warnings and convictions, we should also note the consequences: and then we shall generally see abundant reason to shun their evil ways. But when the Lord makes sinners a warning and beacon to their companions; and yet these fear not, but rush into similar iniquities, their guilt is greatly aggravated. He is the only competent Judge of characters: he knows perfectly how to estimate men’s comparative advantages, with the warnings and the strivings of his Spirit, which they resist; the hypocrisy of their apparent good, and many other discriminating circumstances: and he alone can infallibly determine, whether the open infidel and profligate, or the designing hypocrite, be the more atrocious character. It is dreadful to be proved more criminal than those, who have actually perished in their sins: yet it will be no comfort to the condemned to know, that some others were even still worse than they.

Israel and Judah are called to repent, with gracious promises and solemn warnings, 1—4. A prediction of the invasion of Judah and the ravages of war, for the wickedness and hypocrisy of the inhabitants, 5—18. The prophet bitterly laments the sins and miseries of his people, 19—31.

V. 12—25.

Blessed be God, his word has been proclaimed in this our distant land, not only to dispersed Israel, but to us “sinners of the gentiles” also; calling on us to return unto him, and declaring his plenteous mercy, and readiness to forgive. This goodness of our God should “lead us to repentance,” and humble confession of our sins. But, alas! most men, “after the hardness of their impenitent hearts despise the riches of his mercy,” and proceed to “treasure up wrath against the day of wrath.” (Note, Rom. ii. 4—6.) Hitherto only a small remnant has been called into the true church of God, even from that nation which was, as it were, “married to him;” and but few of this nation, which has been almost equally favoured. What abundant cause then have we to be thankful, if we be of this number? How ought ministers to pray for themselves, and how ought the people to pray for them, that they may be “pastors after God’s own heart, to feed the people with knowledge and understanding:” and that very many such pastors may be raised up in all parts of the world.—In the primitive ages of the church, when the partition-wall was taken down, such pastors abounded, and the number of true Israelites was rapidly increased. But “yet there is room:” the holy nation may still be multiplied exceedingly, its worship may be rendered far more spiritual, its people more weaned from “the imagination of their evil hearts;” and they may be taught to be more of one heart and soul, and “to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” Then Jerusalem will appear to be the glorious throne of JEHOVAH; Israel and Judah will become one in Christ Jesus, and all nations will be gathered unto him.—We are ready, on considering the character of hardened sinners, to say, ‘How can the LORD put such persons among his children, and give them those privileges, and that inheritance, which belong to every one of his family?’ Yet surely the mercy and grace, which have sufficed for us, would suffice for the worst whom we know or can conceive of. He can teach all the nations of the earth to call him Father, and to exercise every filial disposition towards him: and without this change, no man can be partaker of the inheritance of the children of God. But, while professed Christians often treacherously depart from God; the voice of godly sorrow and prayer is sometimes heard from those, who have been most wicked: they have indeed perverted their ways, and forgotten the Lord; and they humbly confess it. Let such then without delay come unto the God of Israel for salvation, that “their backslidings may be healed.”—Sincere penitents renounce all other hopes of salvation, as well as their idols and iniquities.—Whilst men harden themselves in sin, contempt and misery are their portion: but when they are covered with shame and confusion before God, they enter upon safety, comfort, and honour: for “he that covereth his sins shall not prosper, but he that confesseth and forsaketh them, shall have mercy.” (Notes, Prov. xxviii. 13. 1 John i. 8—10.)

2 And thou shalt swear, The LORD liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness; and the nations shall bless themselves in him, and in him shall they glory.

4 Circumcise yourselves to the LORD, and take away the foreskins of your heart, ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem: lest my fury come forth like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings.

to the ten tribes, and to continue the subject of the preceding chapter. (Note, iii. 20—25.) They had been introduced, saying, "Behold we come unto thee, for thou art the LORD our God:" and here they are reminded to return, wholly and in good earnest, to him and his service; and not to rest in a partial or superficial reformation: (Notes, iii. 6—11. Hos. vii. 13—16:) and God assures them, that if they evidence their sincerity, by putting away all their abominable idolatries and iniquities, which they had wrought as in his sight, they shall be re-established in their ancient inheritance, and not remove from it any more, or wander about as they had done. (Note, Ez. xxxix. 23—29.) This was a clear intimation to Judah also, by what means their removal might be prevented.—Thus they would become serious and devout in their religious worship; and they would use the name of the living God, and not that of any idol, in their solemn oaths: they would use it in sincerity, and with reverence and consideration, and not in a trifling manner, or on frivolous occasions: and they would punctually observe their oaths, "in truth, judgment, and righteousness." (Notes, v. 1, 2. Is. xlviii. 1, 2.) Then the nations, seeing their holiness and prosperity, would be induced to seek happiness from God, and to glory in him as their Portion and Salvation; and thus his name would be glorified, which had been dishonoured by the crimes and calamities of his professed worshippers. This implies a prediction of the conjunction of the Israelites and the Gentiles in the Christian church.—The constant mention of swearing, as an act and a part of true religious worship, which in some cases is expressly commanded, constitutes a full proof, that those who understand certain passages in the new Testament, as indiscriminately prohibiting all oaths in every case, lie under a mistake: for God could never have commanded that, which is directly evil in its very nature, as all oaths by this interpretation are supposed to be. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. v. 33—37. Jam. v. 12.)—The nations shall bless themselves in him. (2) Notes, Gen. xii. 1—3, v. 3. xxii. 16—18, v. 18. Ps. lxxii. 17—19.

V. 3, 4. The Jews are here addressed. They were still continued in the land, and favoured with the ordinances of God: their pious king, (assisted by the prophets and others,) was sedulously employed in extirpating idolatry,

5 ¶ Declare ye in Judah, and publish in Jerusalem; and say, Blow ye the trumpet in the land: cry, gather together, and say, Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities.

6 Set up the standard toward Zion: retire, stay not: for I will bring evil from the north, and a great destruction.

7 The lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate; and thy cities shall be laid waste without an inhabitant.

and in promoting religion and righteousness: but the people were generally hypocritical in their concurrence; their hearts continued proud, hard, stout, and carnal; producing spontaneously vice and impiety, but incapable of receiving the good seed of divine instruction. (Note, iii. 6—11.) It was therefore incumbent on them, and absolutely necessary, earnestly to use all means of preparing their hearts for the good seed of divine truth; together with diligence and self-denial, in mortifying their worldly lusts; that they might receive the good seed into a humble, teachable, contrite, and upright heart, by faith and in love; and so bring forth the fruits of it in a holy life. (Notes, Hos. x. 12, 13. Matt. xiii. 3—8. 18—23.) They were indeed disposed to confide and glory in circumcision, as a token of their relation to God. But this would not profit them, unless their hearts were circumcised, by the mortification of all depraved propensities, that they might love God and his holy ways. (Notes, ix. 25, 26. Gen. xvii. 9—12. Deut. x. 16. xxx. 1—10, v. 6. Acts vii. 51—53. Rom. ii. 25—29, vv. 28, 29. iv. 9—12. Col. ii. 11, 12.) Except this inward circumcision, and the consequent dedication of themselves to his service took place; no external privileges or reformation could prevent the execution of the predicted judgments on them: for the wrath of God, for their personal and national sins, would break forth, and burn like fire which could not be quenched.—This preparation of heart is indeed the gift of God, and is frequently promised in scripture: yet it is the sinner's duty to repent, to submit, to fear God, to believe his word, to turn to him, to love and to serve him: and therefore these things are frequently and expressly commanded. (Notes, Ps. li. 10. Ez. xi. 17—20. xviii. 30—32. xxxvi. 25—27. Jam. iv. 7—10, v. 8.)—The word rendered "fore-skins" is translated by the LXX. "hardness of heart," which gives the proper meaning, though not the literal sense, of the passage. Does not this verse strongly mark the distinction between the sacrament of regeneration and regeneration itself? And is it not in fact equivalent to a command to baptized persons, who are not born of God, to regenerate themselves?

after. The alarm is given, as by one upon the spot; it is ordered to be published by the blowing of the trumpet; and the people are called upon to assemble, and take refuge in their strong holds. The standard was to be erected in the way to Zion, that the people might without delay repair thither for safety; and yet this would be in vain, for destruction was at hand. Because Nebuchadnezzar, the conqueror and destroyer of the nations, in all that part of the earth, was risen up, as a fierce lion from the thicket, to go in quest of his prey; and had left Babylon, commissioned by God, to desolate the land and the cities of Judah. (Marg. Ref. r—t.—Notes, xxvii. 4—11. xlix. 19, 20. li. 20—24. Ez. xxi. 19—22.)—North. (6) Notes, i. 13, 14. xxv. 8, 9. Ez. i. 4.

V. 8, 9. (*Marg. Is. xix. 2, 3. 16, 17. Ez. xii. 8—16.)

V. 10. In the prospect of these calamities, the prophet was astonished and afflicted, to see the people secure, and seduced into a vain expectation of peace and prosperity, by means of the false prophets. This the Lord permitted, and appointed in judgment, to punish their contempt of him; and the prophet lamented it, as the most awful of their calamities. For they expected peace, whilst the indignation of the Lord, as a sharp sword, “reached even to the “soul,” and inflicted a mortal wound.—‘Thou hast suffered them to be greatly deceived by their false prophets. ‘...These pretenders to prophecy studied only to speak ‘pleasing things to the people, and soothe them in their ‘impenitency and carnal security; and thou hast in thy ‘just judgment given them up to follow these delusions. ‘Comp. 2 Thes. ii. 11, 12.’ Lowth.—‘Then said I, Ah, ‘Lord God, surely this people and Jerusalem will be ready ‘to cast upon thee the imputation of deceiving them; in

‘that those who have pretended to prophesy unto them, have ‘said, Ye shall have peace, whereas there is nothing but ‘slaughter and devastation.’ Bp. Hall.—‘Thou hast punished their stubbornness, by causing them to hearken ‘unto lies, who would not believe thy truth.’ (Notes, xiv. 13—16. 1 Kings xxii. 19—23. Is. lxiii. 15—19, v. 17. Ez. xiv. 9—11. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12.)

V. 11—13. The approach of the invaders is here represented by striking similitudes. It would be as “a dry “wind,” increasing drought and famine, bringing suffocating heat, and occasioning fatal diseases; and sometimes overwhelming travellers with immense quantities of burning sands, as they passed through the deserts. (Note, Is. xxi. 1.) It would blow from the high places, or waste and unsheltered places in the wilderness, towards Zion. It was not intended to correct and purify the people, as the gentle gale fans and cleanses the corn; but as a full wind to drive all away together: and it would come “unto me:” either to the Lord’s sanctuary, who seems here to speak; and at his command; or to the habitation of the prophet by whom he spake: for God would speedily denounce sentence against Zion, as a condemned criminal. (Note, i. 16.)—To execute this sentence Nebuchadnezzar and his armies would come swiftly and in immense multitudes, so that nothing could stop their progress; as clouds speedily formed darken the sky, and burst forth in a dreadful storm. Thus his chariots would be like a whirlwind to desolate the land. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49—57. Is. xxx. 27, 28. Lam. iv. 18, 19. Nah. ii. 3—6.)

V. 14. Some attention had been paid by the Jews to external reformation: but the heart of Jerusalem, or of its inhabitants, was still polluted, and the seat of idolatry and wickedness: vain and corrupt imaginations, desires, and affections, not only obtained admission, but lodged within, as welcome guests. (Notes, Ps. lxvi. 18, 19. cxix. 113. Acts viii. 18—24, v. 22.) The people still harboured with pleasure the thoughts of returning to their idols and iniquities; and vainly imagined they should be safe and happy in their evil ways; and prosper by their presumptuous confidence in the Egyptians, or in their religious privileges. (Marg. Ref.) This had long been the case, and the prophet enquired, how long they intended that it should be so. (Notes, Prov. i. 21—23. Hos. viii. 5, 6.) For it was absolutely necessary that their hearts should be washed, through true repentance and faith, and by divine grace, from the love and pollution of sin; since no external ablutions and purifications could save their city from desolation, or their souls from hell. (Notes, Is. i. 16—20. Matt. xxiii. 25—28. Luke xi. 39, 40. Jam. iv. 7—10.)

V. 15—18. The prophet, in vision, beholds the invaders entering the northern border of the land. (Judg. xviii. 29. xx. 1. Notes, viii. 14—16.)—Babylon was indeed rather towards the east than directly north from Judah: but the destruction entered the land, at the northern extremity of it. The report of this would spread swiftly from Dan, through the nations which inhabited Ephraim: but the design of the invading army was especially against Jerusalem and Judah; they came from a far country to besiege the cities of Judah, and to watch around them, that no relief should be brought in, and no inhabitants escape out; as men are set to guard the field, and keep the cattle from getting out, or the robbers from breaking in. (Marg. Ref. s.) Thus the sword of the enemy, or the vengeance of the Lord, would pierce their vitals to punish their atrocious rebellions. (Note, ii. 14—9. vv. 15. 18.)—These things. (18) “Thy way, and thy doings have brought a curse upon thee.” Blayney.

V. 19—27. The prophet, to express his full conviction of the certainty of these predicted judgments, and to shew that he had no pleasure in delivering such terrible messages, here speaks of himself, as in great anguish at what in vision he saw and heard. His bowels were in great commotion and agony; his heart was pained and in a tumult through consternation; he could not hold his peace, but must speak of what he foresaw coming on his people, if they persisted in refusing to hearken to him. (Notes, Is. xvi. 8—11. xxii. 4. Lam. ii. 11. Luke xix. 41—44.) The whole scene was shewn him, as if present before him. He heard the trumpet sound the alarm; it was reported to him that one city after another was destroyed; and the whole land was desolated, as easily and speedily as a few tents may be removed: he had continually before his eyes the standard of war, and the trumpet still sounded in his ears. (Note, 5—7.)—Upon this complaint, the Lord himself speaks, to convince his servant of the propriety of his conduct in these awful judgments. He shews him that though the Jews were his professed people, they were foolish and ignorant, and knew him not, because they disliked his holy character and service: they were heedless and inattentive as children; yea, they were sottish, stupid, unteachable children, and seemed destitute of common sense. They had indeed some ingenuity in impiety and iniquity; but were perfectly destitute of understanding as to every thing good. (Note, 1 Cor. xiv. 20—25.)—In consequence of this declaration, the prophet is shewn again, and still more distinctly, in vision, the whole land reduced to confusion and emptiness, like the original chaos: (Note, Gen. i. 2:) the heavens darkened, the mountains trembling, all the inhabitants, and even the fowls of the air, driven away. This represents, in the style of very sublime poetry, the entire subversion of their civil and ecclesiastical government, the termination of all their prosperity, and the total desolation of the land, after the most violent convulsions; which is more plainly predicted in what follows. 'The assemblage is finely made, so as to delineate altogether a most striking and interesting picture of a ruined country; and to justify what has been before observed of the author's happy talent for pathetick description. The earth is brought back as it were to its primitive state of chaos and confusion, the cheerful light of the heavens is withdrawn, and succeeded by a dismal gloom; the mountains tremble and the hills shake under dreadful apprehensions of the Almighty's displeasure; a frightful solitude reigns all around; not a vestige is to be seen of any of the human race; even the birds themselves have deserted the fields.' Blayney. (Notes, Is. xiii. 9—15. Matt. xxiv. 29—31.) Yet it is also intimated, that this ruin of the nation would not be final. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxx. 10, 11. xlv. 27, 28.)

V. 30, 31. Jerusalem is here represented as a harlot: and it is enquired, what she would do when these judgments came upon her. Her gay clothing and costly ornaments, and her painting, (which for the present might cover the defects of the face, but afterwards would rend it, and make it deformed,) could be of no avail. (Notes, 2 Kings ix. 30—37, v. 30. Is. iii. 16, 17.) That is, none of Jerusalem's outward privileges, or hypocritical professions, none of her contrivances and efforts would prevent her destruction: for even the nations, which had seduced her to idolatry, would despise her. (Notes, xxii. 20—23. Lam. i. 1, 2. 18—22. Ez. xxiii. 11—27.) The city is therefore next represented under the image of a travelling woman, in her first labour, when her pains and tears may be supposed the greatest: for in this manner, and under the impression of these affecting images, the prophet must bewail the massacres and desolations, which were coming on the inhabitants of Jerusalem: or, Jerusalem would bewail her own complicated miseries. (Marg. Ref. b—g.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The Lord will assuredly pardon and bless all those, however criminal, who "return to him with their whole hearts;" and shew that they are sincere penitents, "by putting away all their abominations," as in his sight who "requires truth in the inward parts:" but a formal or a partial reformation will be of no avail.—While Christians, so called, are notoriously addicted to injustice, fraud, lying, and oppression; while they trifle with the most solemn subscriptions, engagements, and oaths, which are administered without reverence, taken without consideration, and violated without hesitation; while these are multiplied on such frivolous occasions, and men shew a contempt of God and of justice, at the same time, by rash, as well as profane swearing; it cannot be expected that Pagans or Mohammedans should be impressed in favour of Christianity or expect much good from embracing it. But whenever a contrary conduct shall distinguish the disciples of Jesus from all other men, in all parts of the world; one grand obstacle to the conversion of the nations will be removed and we may confidently hope, that they will be induced to "bless themselves, and glory" in our God and Saviour. It should therefore be our constant aim, to prevail, if possible, with professed Christians, to "break up the fallow ground, and not to sow among thorns:" that, not content with empty forms and notions, they may seek for humble, serious, and broken heart, in which the word of God may take root, and bring forth fruit to perfection. (Note, Luke viii 4—15.) And we should begin with ourselves: for without serious self-examination, deep convictions of our guilt and depravity, fervent prayers, and constant endeavours to be influenced in our conduct by the truths which we receive; all the advantages of revelation and all the labours of the minister, will to us be in vain. Let us then recollect, that the true baptism, as well as the true "circumcision, is that of the heart:" and as the Lord commands us to "put off the body of the sins of the flesh," and to remove all the impediments of our corrupt nature, that we may fear, trust, and love him; let us turn these precepts into prayers, and intreat him to "create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within us." For "except a man be born again, he cannot see," n

CHAP. V.

The judgments of God on the Jews, for the incorrigible wickedness of all ranks and orders among them, 1—6; for adultery, 7—9; impious contempt of God's word, 10—14; idolatry, 15—19; blindness, presumption, and ingratitude, 20—25; injustice and oppression, 26—29; and the favour shewn to false prophets, 30, 31.

“enter into, the kingdom of God;” and if men die unchanged, “his fury will come forth like fire and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of their doings.” In a case therefore of such urgent necessity, the less we can do of ourselves, the more need we have to cry incessantly to the Lord for help. (Note, xxxi. 18—20.)—He commonly warns before he strikes: but if his warnings are despised, they will soon be realized in judgments: and when he arises to execute vengeance, sinners will find it in vain to combine for mutual defence, or to flee any whither for refuge; and no “roaring lion,” or “destroyer of the nations,” is to be dreaded, in comparison with “him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell.” Yet when he uses ambitious men, besides their intention, as his instruments of temporal punishment, the sufferers are made to howl and lament most dolefully. When he contends, men are soon dispirited and infatuated; their resolution and capacity fail them, and their hearts sink and perish within them: but none are more stupified with astonishment and terror on such occasions, than ungodly priests and false teachers.—The justice of God, in leaving sinners to be deceived, and to “expect peace when vengeance reacheth to the soul,” is very awful. The faithful servants of God deprecate from the people this judgment, above all others; yet they often perceive that he sees good to inflict it. On this account they are treated as malevolent, censorious, and spiritually proud; for they cannot but remind their hearers of the distinction betwixt a faithful minister of the gospel, and a blind guide, or a teacher of lies in the garb of a priest: but the event will justify their conduct, and convince all the world of the reality and immense importance of this disregarded distinction.—When light calamities are not effectual to fan and cleanse congregations, churches, or nations professing Christianity, God will give sentence upon them; a whirlwind and storm of vengeance will be commissioned to execute his word; and then it will be unavailing to say, “Woe unto us! for we are undone.”

V. 14—31.

Exhortations and encouragements should be blended with warnings; that men may neither presume, nor be left without hope: but we must still insist upon it, that without “the heart be washed from wickedness,” and vain thoughts and desires dislodged from it, there can be no salvation. (Note, Is. lv. 6, 7.) We can also point out that Fountain, in which the most polluted may wash and be clean; and direct them to One, that is able and willing to assist them in this work: we can assure them, that all who are thus washed shall be saved: and we should distinguish between those, who “hate vain thoughts” and sinful imaginations, but are often harassed by them; and those, who love, entertain, and lodge them in their hearts.—This has too long been the case with us all: but how long do sinners intend that it should be so with them? Would they be willing to die, when their hearts are thus occupied with evil imaginations and lustings; and remain to eternity the proud carnal enemies of God and holiness? If not, no time should be lost. For his voice declares from afar, that misery is speedily approaching, especially against wicked professors of the gospel: and when this overtakes them, it will be evident, that their rebellious “ways and doings have procured these things unto themselves;” and that the fruit of wickedness is bitter and the end fatal.—Those who believe and preach the word of God, clearly foresee that destruction of sinners, of which others have little apprehension; and the prospect often pains them to the heart: yet because they cannot hold their peace, but must warn, exhort, and expostulate with sinners, and intreat them to “flee from the wrath to come,” they are deemed troublers of the city: and are even accused of taking pleasure in denouncing damnation; whilst their aim and constant prayers are, that men may be wise and make haste to escape it; and while their benevolence, and compassion towards even their revilers, in their temporal distresses, fully refute the injurious charge. But often neither warnings nor judgments make due impression, even on men called Christians; they shew themselves foolish and rebellious, and prove that they know not the Lord; yea, sottish children, without common sense in the concerns of their souls, though in other respects ingenious, and reputed as oracles. But what a wretched thing is it to be “wise to do evil,” and treasure up wrath; but to have no understanding to do good! Whatever else we know not, may the Lord make us to be ‘of good understanding in the way of godliness!’—How has sin marred God’s fair creation, and almost reduced it again to a confused chaos! They, whose treasure is on earth, may be soon bereaved of it, by revolutions in kingdoms or human affairs, or removed from it by death: and ere long the visible creation will pass away, and be no more seen. (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 10—13. Rev. xx. 11—15.) But the Lord will not make a full end of his people. As for his enemies: their light will soon be put out in utter darkness: and all those things, which have here appeared admirable or honourable in them, will terminate in contempt and misery, of which no images in nature can give us an adequate conception.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. We are not informed, at what time this message from God was delivered: if it could be supposed to have been in the latter part of Josiah’s reign, it might serve to explain the mystery of Providence, in removing so prematurely that pious king. Yet it can scarcely be conceived, that the external conduct of the Jews was so very abandoned during his life: and therefore it may perhaps be referred to the time immediately succeeding his death, when their wickedness burst forth the more impetuously, for the temporary restraint which had been put upon it. (Note, 2 Chr. xxiv. 17—26.)—The Lord speaks to the prophet, and a very few others who interceded for the people; and directs them to make a diligent and accurate survey of Jerusalem; of her streets, and the broad places where business was transacted, and where justice should have been administered; and let them see whether they could find a man, who executed justice and sought the truth: and if they could, he would for his sake pardon the city; and not bring on it those desolating judgments, which they deprecated. (Notes, Gen. xviii. 23—32. Is. lix. 9—15, v. 15. 16—19, v. 16. Ez. xxii. 30.) Their depravity was so universal, that none could be found, who either did justice to man, or enquired after the truth and will of God. The very few persons of this character who remained, were driven into obscurity, and made afraid to shew themselves. (Notes, 1 Kings xix. 10. 18. Prov. xxviii. 28.) Especially not one could be met with, among the rulers and chief priests, who acted as a pious and upright man, in the important duties of his station. Multitudes, as avowed idolaters, swore by their idols (7): and even the few, who professed themselves the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and swore by his name, scrupled not to commit perjury, and to use a solemn act of worship to cloke their iniquity; and hesitated not to violate the vows and engagements which they had thus ratified. (Note, iv. 1, 2.)

V. 3—6. Undeniable facts constrained the prophet to allow, that the character of his people was such as had been described.—Were not the eyes of God upon the truth? His "judgment was according to truth:" he looked on sincerity and equity with approbation, and he was concerned to maintain the cause of truth; but he could not fail to abhor the iniquity and hypocrisy which he witnessed.

It was evident, that the people despised his rebukes and corrections; and refusing to profit by them, they obstinately persisted in impenitence, and their hearts were become even harder than a rock. (Notes, ii. 26—30. 2 Chr. xxviii. 22, 23. Prov. xxix. 1. Is. i. 5, 6. Zech. vii. 11—14.)—The prophet had hoped that this was the case only of the poor, who were profane and wicked, for want of a better education and fuller instructions, and more leisure for studying the law of God. Having therefore met with discouragement in speaking to them, he purposed to address the rich and great, whose minds were more stored with the knowledge of God and his word, and who would better understand his instructions. But he found them even far worse: for they had altogether cast off the yoke of subjection to God; broken through all the restraints of duty, conscience, fear, and shame; and run into the most enormous impiety and iniquity: (Note, Is. xxix. 9—12:) therefore their enemies, like lions, or wolves, (in the evening, when they are most fierce and hungry,) and leopards, would be let loose to besiege their cities and destroy the inhabitants: especially as they grew more determined in their apostasies, notwithstanding all the methods used to reclaim them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m—p.)

V. 7—9. Could it consist with the honour of God to pardon Israel these complicated and obstinate rebellions? (Notes, xlv. 20—23, v. 22.) One generation after another grew up in idolatry, and even swore by idols, whose names they were forbidden to mention; thus giving them the honour due to the omniscient God alone. (Notes, 1, 2. xii. 14—17. Ex. xxiii. 13. Josh. xxiii. 7. Hos. iv. 15. Zeph. i. 5.) And when the Lord, who gave them their good land, had exceedingly prospered them, they assembled by troops, not only in the temples of their idols, and for their licentious rites; but in the harlots' houses, without any regard to decency. (Notes, Num. xv. 1—3.) Their idolatry was connected with most scandalous and shameless lewdness, and their plenty led them to every kind of self-indulgence: so that, in contempt of God's ordinance of marriage, and of his holy law, they every one impetuously coveted his neighbour's wife, and sought opportunities of committing adultery with her. V. 15-18. In the preceding verse God addressed the prophet: but here he speaks by him to the people, and declares that he will bring against them "from afar," a very powerful and ancient nation. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 14, 15. Is. v. 26-30, v. 26.)—Judah and Israel had in former times been principally oppressed by the adjacent nations: but the Chaldeans came from a great distance, having subjugated all the former oppressors of Israel, and become exceedingly powerful. The building of Babylon was begun soon after the flood; (Notes, Gen. x. 8-12. xi. 1-9.—Mic. v. 5, 6;) and we read of the Chaldeans in the book of Job, which is supposed to have been written as early as the time of Moses; (Job i. 17;) though the Chaldean monarchy had but lately been established.—God would bring this mighty nation upon them, to inflict the vengeance predicted by Moses: (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49-59:) and as they used another language, which the Jews did not understand, they would be more regardless of their complaints, and cruel in their oppressions. (Note, Is. xxxiii. 17-19.) When they opened their quivers, destruction would be the certain consequence; as the opening of a sepulchre denotes that death has taken place. (Note, Ps. v. 9.) Thus the Jews would endure every misery, as far as consisted with their escaping total extirpation. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 30-34.)—Some indeed suppose the words, "I will not make a full end with you," to mean, that God would still have further judgments in reserve for them. "For all this his anger is not turned away; but his hand is stretched out still." (Note, Is. v. 24, 25.) In either sense it is a most remarkable prediction.—The vengeance executed on the Jews, for "crucifying the Lord of glory," was far more terrible, and has been of far longer continuance, than that brought upon them by the Chaldeans: and yet "a full end has not been made" of the nation, which is at present exceedingly numerous, and is preserved distinct from other nations, no doubt for very important purposes in Providence. (Marg. Ref. on 10. iv. 27.—Notes, xxx. 10, 11. xlv. 27, 28. Is. vi. 13. lxxv. 8—10. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22.)

V. 19. ' Those that fall under the severity of God's ' judgments, are apt to think so favourably of themselves, ' as to wonder why they should be singled out as examples ' of the divine vengeance, and of terror to others. And ' particularly the Jews thought this severe proceeding ' scarce consistent with those many gracious promises God ' had made unto their nation.' Lowth.—Yet the very books of Moses, if they had been duly attended to, were fully sufficient to silence for ever this presumptuous objection. V. 20—25. The whole seed of Jacob, but especially the Jews, are here called upon to hear the rebuke of God. He had given them senses, rational powers, and abundant opportunities of information; yet they continued as senseless, as if destitute of eyes, ears, and understandings. (Notes, Is. vi. 9, 10. xlv. 18. Matt. xiii. 13—15. Mark viii. 17—21.) The restless and impetuous waves of the ocean seemed to stand in awe of that decree, which God had given from the beginning, to continue in perpetual force, that they should not pass the bounds of the sandy shore. (Notes, Gen. i. 9. Job xxxviii. 8—11. Ps. xxxiii. 7, 8. civ. 6—9. Prov. viii. 27—30.) Yet Israel, more senseless and unruly, did not reverence the authority of God, nor tremble at his wrath; but burst all the restraints of his law, in the rebellion of their apostate hearts, and were wholly revolted and gone into idolatry, impiety, and wickedness! Neither had they understanding to consider their own interest. When they adhered to the worship of God, he gave them seasonable rains and plentiful harvests: yet when their apostasy had caused him to withhold these good things from them, they could not be induced to return to him, in order that they might recover them. (Notes, iii. 2, 3. xiv. 19—22. Joel ii. 12—17. Acts xii. 20—23, v. 20.)—Fear ye not me? (22) Notes, x. 6—8. Matt. x. 27. 28. Rev. xv. 1—4.

V. 26—29. Men as atrociously wicked might be found among the people of JEHOVAH, as among the worst of the Gentiles. They were generally occupied in over-reaching and defrauding one another: and thus their houses were replenished with the gains of deceit, as the fowler's cage with the birds that he has ensnared. In this manner they lived in luxury and magnificence, and even surpassed in wickedness the worst of sinners in other ages and nations. Nor did the rulers redress the wrongs done to the poor, the widows, and orphans, being induced to connivance by bribes, and interested motives: yet by these means they prospered, whilst the Lord was preparing vengeance against the whole nation. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 7—9. ix. 3—Ps. x. 2—11, vv. 8—10. ci. Prov. i. 10—14. Hos. xii. —9. Mic. vi. 10—15. vii. 1—4. Hab. i. 12—17, vv. 14—16. Mal. iii. 5, 6. Jam. v. 1—6.)—The last clause is very expressive in the original. "Shall not my soul avenge itself on a nation, which is like unto this?"—Yet thou prosper. (28) "The cause of the orphan, so as to cause it to prosper." Blayney.

and the priests † bear rule by their means; and † my people love to have it so: † and what will ye do in the end thereof?

V. 30, 31. The most wonderful and horrible wickedness that was committed in the land, and which above all things hastened the ruin of the nation, was the combination of the false prophets and ambitious priests, to seduce the people into a presumptuous security. The prophets accommodated their predictions to the humour of the chief priests, and the princes who were influenced by them: and thus the nation was deceived into the expectation of permanent prosperity, and submitted quietly to the despotick domination of the ungodly rulers and teachers: for they loved the flattering delusion, which encouraged them in sin; and emboldened them to despise the disagreeable messages of the true prophets. (Notes, xxiii. 9—15. xxvi. 9—11. Is. xxx. 8—11. Ez. xxii. 25—28. xxxiv. 2—6. Mic. iii. 8—12.) But what would they do, when the event should verify those dreadful denunciations, which they now treated as the effect of a gloomy imagination, or a malevolent disposition? (Note, Is. x. 1—4. Ez. xxii. 14. Zech. i. 5, 6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

To what an awful condition is the earth reduced by sin, when even in the cities and countries most favoured with the means of grace, so few are found, who “execute judgment and seek the truth;” or who make any conscience of the most solemn oaths and sacred engagements! Alas, impiety and iniquity greatly abound in this our land: yet we may find a considerable number, who are both conscientious in their whole conduct, and steady friends to the truths of God; and for their sakes, in answer to their prayers, and by his blessing on their endeavours, we hope that the Lord will yet spare us. It must, however, be confessed, that the more carefully we investigate the state of religion, comparing it accurately with the standard of scripture; the worse opinion we shall generally be constrained to entertain of it: and too often we find, that an attachment to the truths, and an attendance on the most sacred ordinances of religion, are made subservient to mere secular designs. But nothing more provokes the Lord, than our multiplied perjuries, prevaricating subscriptions to sacred things, and prostituted sacramental engagements. We are sure that “the eyes of the Lord are upon the truth:” and, believing him to be righteous in his most mysterious dispensations, we shall gradually be led to see something of the reasons of his conduct; by observing the ingratitude, perverseness, and obstinate rebellion of sinners, who harden their hearts against his mercies, rebukes, corrections, and convictions. This is readily allowed to be the case of numbers in the lower orders of society, who are as profligate, as ignorant; who neither know, nor desire to be taught, the way of the Lord; and who plead their want of learning and leisure as an excuse for the most abandoned vice and impiety. But if the faithful minister of God, discouraged by his ill-success among them, and by their unteachableness and obstinacy, should embrace some opportunity of betaking himself to those in superior stations, and such as possess authority, affluence, dignity, or learning; he will commonly have cause to mourn under still greater discouragements. He will find their pride of superiority; their habits of being flattered, humoured, and submitted to, by every one, and indulged in every thing; their infidel contempt of sacred things, which they have learned sophistically to defend; and their enmity to the truths and precepts of the gospel, which run counter to all their maxims, habits, and pursuits; to be far more insurmountable obstacles to his success, than even the ignorant profligacy of the unprincipled poor. So that, in our land, though we have a few exceptions, to the honour of divine grace to which nothing is impossible; it may be said of most of the great and noble, that “they have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds.” Nay, in one respect they are worse than the Jewish nobles: for many of them are more unacquainted with the scriptures, than the untutored multitude. This is an alarming symptom of the decayed condition of our constitution in church and state: and as “our transgressions are multiplied, and “our apostasies increased,” we cannot but fear that national judgments, though mercifully retarded, will at length overtake us. And indeed how can we expect, that the Lord should always bear with us and pardon us; when our youth are trained up in infidelity and impiety; when they abuse the bounty of Providence in licentious excess, and learn early to “commit adultery, and assemble themselves by troops in the harlots’ houses;” and when such numbers, whose example should discountenance vice, not content with every other indulgence of their unbridled lusts, are “like fed horses in the morning, every one neighing after his neighbour’s wife?” “Shall not the LORD then visit for these things? and will not his soul be avenged on such a nation as this?”—But in general the minister of God must expect to be disregarded, when he protests against these and similar abominations, and warns ungodly men to beware of temporal judgments, and of eternal punishment. For their presumption commonly equals their profligacy; and frequently they deem themselves entitled to the special protection of God, and deserving of his favour, notwithstanding their enormous wickedness! We must therefore lay our account with being called misanthropes, hypocrites, or fanaticks, if we faithfully “declare the whole counsel of God.” But, whilst men thus revile or ridicule those, who “speak according to the oracles of God;” they treat Him as a liar, his word as an imposture, and his denunciations as a bugbear; and they will surely find at length, that the words which they despised will prove fire, to consume them as the fuel for the Lord’s indignation.

V. 15—31.

Ministers are not at present authorized to predict national judgments, or to declare what instruments God intends to employ, or in what way he will punish sinners: but they are commissioned to declare, that all the prosperity and confidence of the ungodly will shortly fail, and leave them in everlasting misery and despair. If men will yet enquire, "Wherefore doeth the LORD these things unto us?" let them be referred to their unnumbered iniquities, and manifold ungodliness, for an answer. And let them be reminded, that the most tremendous effects of their sins might yet be prevented, if they could but be prevailed on to use their senses, faculties, and advantages in a proper manner. But alas! for this they have no disposition; "having eyes they see not, having ears they hear not," and their rational powers leave them without understanding. So that, whilst all nature proclaims the perfections, and obeys the mandates, of her Creator; man, when left to himself, with all his boasted powers, neither fears his wrath, regards his authority, is grateful for his mercies, nor values his favour; but his revolting and rebellious heart carries him far off from the worship and service of his Maker. And whilst the Lord, year after year, gives plenteous seasons, and "reserveth to us the appointed weeks of harvest;" men live on his bounty, and are thus emboldened to increase their transgressions against him. Nay, when their "iniquities have turned away these good things from them," they seldom so far consider even their temporal interest, as to use any means of recovering his favour; but vent their disquietude in rebellious complaints, and bitter revilings of one another! It is notorious, that wickedness of every kind prevails among multitudes of nominal Christians, as much as among heathens; nay, that in some respects they even exceed them: so that they treat their brethren as lawful prey, and set traps and lay snares for each other, to plunder, defraud, enslave, or murder them, and thus fill their houses with abundance, through deceit; they wax rich and great, and live in luxury and splendour on the spoils of the poor. It is also to be lamented, that even rulers, out of interest and policy, often leave such men unmolested, and do not judge the cause of the orphan, the widow, the destitute, the oppressed. But, whilst these things ripen guilty nations for vengeance, and ruin the souls of men; nothing is in reality so horrible and lamentable, as the ambition, avarice, ignorance, unfaithfulness, and wickedness of numbers, who are the nominal priests and prophets of the Lord. (Note, Is. lvi. 9—12.) Too many, who profess to teach religion, prophesy falsely; others enjoy affluence, dignity, and authority by their means; and most of the people love to be thus soothed into a false and fatal security. But what will they do in the approaching day of judgment, and final retribution? "Oh, that men were wise, that they understood these things, that they would consider their latter end!"

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. This chapter proceeds with the subject of the foregoing, and predicts the increasing wickedness of the Jews till the captivity; as well as the desolations which then took place. Part of Jerusalem was situated in the lot of Benjamin, and inhabited by that tribe: (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 12. Josh. xv. 63 :) and the Benjamites are here warned to prepare with concert and earnestness to leave the city, that they might seek refuge in some other place.—In the beginning of the Chaldean invasion, the people no doubt flocked to Jerusalem as a place of safety (25); but this prophetic warning intimated, that it would soon be so straitened by the siege, that its old inhabitants would be glad to leave it. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 15—18.)—The signals, here mentioned, were those at that time in use.—Beth-haccerem was about three miles from Jerusalem, in the road to Tekoa. (Marg. Ref. Neh. iii. 14.)—North.] Notes, i. 13, 14. iv. 15—18.

V. 2, 3. The prophet here compares Jerusalem to a beautiful woman, accustomed to a delicate and self-indulgent life, who would be soon exposed defenceless to brutal violence: or, as some render it, to "a luxuriant pasture," which allures the shepherds to bring their flocks to eat it up. Thus the Chaldean invaders were induced by the riches and prosperity of Jerusalem, to encamp in companies against her: and, meeting with feeble resistance, they soon devoured her and shared the spoil. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

I have likened, &c. (2) "The habitation, even the delightful one, I have doomed to destruction." Blayney. The verb ^{הָרַס} signifies to destroy, as well as to liken; but not to doom to destruction; yet the predicting of any event is sometimes expressed in this manner. (Note, i. 9, 10.) On this rendering, JEHOVAH himself is the Speaker.

V. 4—8. The Lord here commissions the Chaldeans to prepare war against Jerusalem: and immediately they are represented, as all in earnest and in motion, exciting each other to dispatch, lamenting that the least time is lost, and beginning or continuing their march even during the 5 Arise, and let us go by night, and let us destroy her palaces.

6 For thus hath the LORD of hosts said, "Hew ye down trees, and cast a mount against Jerusalem: this is the city to be visited; she is wholly oppression in the midst of her."

7 As a fountain casteth out her waters, so she casteth out her wickedness: violence and spoil is heard in her; before me continually is grief and wounds.

8 Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem, lest my soul depart from thee; lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited.

9 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine: turn back thine hand as a grape-gatherer into the baskets.

10 ¶ To whom shall I speak, and give warning, that they may hear? behold, their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken: behold, the word of the LORD is unto them a reproach; they have no delight in it.

11 Therefore I am full of the fury of the LORD; I am weary with holding in: I will pour it out upon the children abroad, and upon the assembly of young men together: for even the husband with the wife shall be taken, the aged with him that is full of days.

12 And their houses shall be turned unto others, with their fields and wives together; for I will stretch out my hand upon the inhabitants of the land, saith the LORD.

night, as in haste to destroy her palaces. The Lord purposed that they should execute his judgments on that city, which was to be visited for her oppression and impiety: and they were as effectually induced to besiege it, as if he had headed their troops, and given the word of command.—The wicked lives of the inhabitants sprang from their corrupt principles and depraved affections, as naturally and plentifully, as waters from the fountain. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, Prov. iv. 23. Matt. xv. 15—20.) The cries of those, who suffered violence and oppression, were continually heard in the city: and the Lord meditated to repay the wickedness of the oppressors with grief and wounds. Yet till instruction was given, and mercy proposed; which would leave the obstinate transgressors more inexcusable, but would give encouragement to the few who might repent: and the people were warned to profit by their corrections and rebukes, as well as by their peculiar advantages, otherwise the special favour of God for them as a nation would be discontinued, as well as their land left utterly desolate. (Notes, Hos. ix. 9—14.)—This threatening God fulfilled afterward, when he suffered the city and nation to be utterly ruined and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: but it still received a further completion, in that final desolation brought upon them by the Romans. lowth.—Prepare, &c. (4) Or, "Sanctify." V. 9. The Chaldeans would not only carry away captive the principal people of the land; but they would return again and again, to gather the poor remains, till all were gone: as the gleanings of the vine are gathered; when the gatherer, having put some of the grapes into his basket, turns back his hand to collect those which yet remain, and convey them to the same place. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, ix. 9—11, v. 9. lii. 24—29. Is. xvii. 4—8, v. 6. xxiv. 3—15, v. 13.)

V. 10—12. (Notes, v. 3—6. Is. xxviii. 9—13.) The prophet had, without success, addressed both the poor and the rich: and to whom should he now testify, or give warning? (Note, 1 Thes. iv. 6—8, v. 6.) Pride, prejudice, and the love of idols and iniquities, so closed their ears, that the word of God could find no entrance: they could not hearken, because they hated God and his service; and their inability aggravated their guilt. (Notes, iv. 3, 4. Is. vi. 9, 10. John v. 39—44, v. 44. xii. 37—41. Acts vii. 51—53.) They counted his precepts, warnings, and reproofs to be a reproach to them: they were affronted at the prophets for describing their characters, exposing the ingratitude and rebellion of their conduct, and shewing what punishment they deserved and were exposed to: they could not endure those teachers, who were always reproaching them with their sins; but preferred such as had a better opinion of them, and gave them more encouragement. (Notes, Luke xi. 45. 2 Tim. iv. 1—5.)—The prophet, perceiving them set against his testimony, seems to have been tempted to decline his work: but he was inwardly constrained to speak, being full of the furious indignation of the Lord against their sins, and not able to withhold himself from declaring it. (Note, xx. 7—9.) He would therefore pour his warnings out before the first persons that he met with; though they should be the children playing in the streets, or the young men assembled for their pleasure and diversion: as he clearly foresaw desolating judgments coming upon all the inhabitants of the land, without distinction of age or sex.

the prophets dealt falsely for filthy lucre's sake. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, v. 26—31, viii. 10—12. Is. lvi. 9—12. Mic. iii. 8—12.) They ought to have probed the consciences of the people, and faithfully shewn them their real state and character, with solemn warnings, reproofs, and expostulations; and, taking the opportunity of public calamities or perils, have attempted to lead them to true repentance and conversion: but, instead of treating them in this faithful and skilful manner, which would have put them to some pain, yet might have effected a radical cure; being themselves slaves to avarice and other corrupt passions, they only directed them to superficial observances, and then confidently assured them of peace and prosperity. Thus the wound was skinned over without being cured, and was sure to break out more fatally in a little time. (Notes, iv. 10. v. 30, 31. xiv. 13—16. xxiii. 13—17. xxviii. 2—4. Is. i. 5, 6. Ez. xiii. 10—23. Mic. iii. 5—7.) This seems especially to be the abomination, of which the prophet next speaks; and which, having committed, they were not ashamed of: nay, when the event shewed them to be lying prophets, they could not be put to the blush, but faced it out with the utmost effrontery; and still carried on the same infamous business for filthy lucre's sake. The Lord had therefore determined, that the covetous priests and lying prophets should be especially marked for destruction, among those that would fall by the sword. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—viii. 10—12.)

V. 16, 17. The Lord here reminds the people of the directions, which he had always given them by his prophets, in order that they might know and walk in his ways. They were called on to attend to instruction, and to enquire for the old way, which had been prescribed by Moses and the ancient prophets, and which was marked with the footsteps of the patriarchs, and their pious ancestors in more prosperous days. Thus, by diligent enquiry they would find the good way of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, and, walking in it, they would "find rest to their souls." (Notes, Cant. i. 7, 8. Is. xxviii. 12, 13. Matt. xi. 28—30.) But they resolved, and avowed their determination, not to walk in those ways. And when the Lord had set his prophets, as watchmen, to sound the alarm of approaching judgments, they determined not to take warning! (Notes, xxv. 3—7. xliii. 1—3, xlv. 15—18. Ez. iii. 17—21. xxxiii. 2—9. Matt. xi. 16—24.)—Old paths, (16) נְתִיבוֹת עִדָּוָה. Note, Is. lxiv. 5.

V. 18—20. The heathen nations, as well as "the congregation" of Israel, are here called upon to hear and understand the wickedness, which was found among the people of JEHOVAH; for which he would bring evil upon them. This would be the natural consequence of their rebellious thoughts and devices, and of their contemptuous rejection of his law and authority, and his messages by the prophets. (Note, xxxi. 10—14, v. 10.) And how could they expect, that their hypocritical burning of costly incense and perfumes, and their multiplied sacrifices, could be acceptable to him; when the spirit, in which they offered them, was an additional provocation? (Notes, vii. 21—23. Is. i. 10—15. xliii. 22—25.)

V. 21. The Lord, provoked by the sins of the Jews was determined so to order his providential dispensations as to occasion their judicial infatuation. Thus they would through their own perverseness, stumble and fall, by choosing those measures which directly tended to their ruin. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xiii. 15—17, v. 16. Is. viii. 11—15. Ez. xiv. 1—11. Rom. ix. 30—33. xi. 7—10. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8.)

V. 22, 23. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, i. 13, 14. v. 15—18. l. 41, 42. Is. xlvii. 6.)—Roareth, &c. (23) "Hostile invasions are fitly compared to great inundations, that carry all before them, and lay a country waste. Is. xvii. 12. Dan. ix. 26. Lowth. (Note, Is. v. 26—30.)

V. 24—26. The people seem to be here prophetically represented, as in conversation on the report of the Chaldean invasion: and, being filled with anguish and dismay, they exhort one another to keep close within the walls of Jerusalem; as all other places were exposed to the ravages of the enemy, and full of terror and destruction. And while thus employed, the prophet is sent to warn them and the whole nation, (called, “the daughter of my people,”) to shew every token of the deepest sorrow and distress, as they would suddenly be plundered, with immense slaughter, by the victorious assailants. (Marg. Ref. Notes, iv. 5—13. ix. 17—19. Jon. iii. 5—9. Mic. i. 10—16. Zech. xii. 9—14, v. 10.)

V. 27—30. The Lord had raised up the prophet, made him courageous and firm in his duty, and secured him as a fortress against every enemy: (Note, i. 17—19:) not in order to preserve the city from ruin; but to prove and discover the temper of the people, to shew their incorrigible wickedness, and to illustrate the divine justice in punishing them: thus he was appointed to investigate their whole conduct, and to bring in his report concerning them. For they were most grievous rebels and apostates, who slandered the ways and prophets of God to excuse themselves, and employed themselves as tale-bearers. (Note, Lev. xix. 6.) They seemed to be gold or silver: but indeed they were base metal, without any mixture of precious ore; and they continually corrupted one another more and more. (Note, Is. i. 4.) The prophets, whom the Lord used as instruments to assay, refine, and purify them, were not only worn out by useless labour, but put to death for attempting it; as if the refiner’s bellows were thrown into the fire, and his lead consumed to no purpose: nay, all the judgments and mercies of God were in vain; for wickedness was not separated from among them. (Notes, ix. 7. Prov. vii. 3. xxv. 4, 5. Is. i. 21—27. Ex. xxii. 18—22. Zech. iii. 8, 9. Mal. iii. 1—4, v. 3. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.) Indeed the whole mass was proved to be refuse metal; and not silver, as it had once appeared to be: and men would treat them with contempt, because God no longer regarded them as his people.—“Their impudence resembles brass, and their obstinacy may be compared to iron. ... Before the use of quicksilver was known, they made use of lead for the refining their metals.” Lowth.

Corrupters. (28) Or, “Adulterating;” as men adulterate silver or gold, with base metals.—Reprobate. (30) Note, 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—2.

Ungodly prosperity, when the Lord is provoked to withdraw his protection, renders men the richer prey to the rapacious, and affords them no security against their depredations: and the more admired, indulged, or delicate they are, the more dreadful will they find it to endure hardship.—Those who are intent on worldly gain, or glory and dominion, (though by inflicting miseries on others,) are assiduous, and indefatigable; they lose no time, deny themselves even ordinary refreshments, and consider hindrances as grievous calamities: how shameful then is it, that we should be so attached to our own ease and indulgence, when the glory of God, the welfare of our neighbours, and the salvation of our own souls, demand our vigorous and patient activity!—(Notes, Luke xvi. 1—8, v. 8. 1 Cor. ix. 24—27.)—The Lord uses wicked men as the executioners of his vengeance; and he girds, directs, and prospers them, though they know him not: but it is far more desirable, in the humblest station, to promote the good of our brethren; and it will meet with a far different recompence.—The wickedness of men’s lives springs from the corrupt nature of their hearts: this fountain may, in part and for a time, be stopped; yet it will “cast forth its waters;” and unless it be cleansed and changed, we can do nothing spiritually good. (Note, xvii. 9, 10.)—All the secret, as well as the open iniquity in the world is continually “before the eyes of the LORD;” and he will repay oppressors with more terrible miseries, than they can inflict on their poor brethren.—To be separated from God and his favour, is the greatest evil which can befall a rational creature: yet numbers hear the words of the Judge himself declaring, that he will at last say to all the wicked, “Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;” and yet they con-

CHAP. VII.

Jeremiah is sent to the temple, to call the Jews to repentance, that they might not be removed, 1—3; to reprove their presumptuous confidence in the temple, while living in gross wickedness, 4—11; and to predict that Jerusalem would be desolated, like Shiloh; and the people carried captive, as Israel had been, 12—15. God directs the prophet not to pray for them. He shews him their idolatries, and the judgments about to come on them, 16—20. He rejects with disdain the sacrifices of the disobedient; and exposes the perverse conduct of the nation, from their departure out of Egypt, 21—28. A call to mourning for the prevailing abominations, and a denunciation of desolating judgments, 29—34.

tinue careless and unconcerned! Nay, they even seem to “say to the Almighty, Depart from us, we desire not the “knowledge of thy ways!”—So long as men continue uninstructed amidst opportunities of instruction, and unsanctified amidst the best means of sanctification, and under repeated salutary chastisements, there is reason to fear, that the Lord will depart from them in final indignation: and he will surely withdraw the light of his gospel from those, who generally despise and abuse it; and this is a more grievous judgment, than any temporal calamity.—When he shall arise to take vengeance, no sinner, of any age, rank, or sex, can possibly escape; but they shall every one be collected, as grapes are gathered to be cast into the wine-press.

V. 10—15.

The most obvious and undeniable truths are, alas! properly noticed by very few. Most men stop their ears against all salutary warnings and instructions; and their pride and lusts render them incapable of hearing, understanding, believing, and obeying the gospel of Christ. They count the faithful preaching of God’s word “a reproach” and affront to them; and either neglect all religious instruction, or “turn away their ears from the “truth to hearken to fables.” This often so discourages the zealous minister, that he has little heart to speak any more: yet a sense of duty, zeal for the honour of God, holy indignation against sin, and a hope of rescuing a few at least from perdition, constrain him to proceed, and to declare the wrath of God against the impenitent workers of iniquity: and, being weary of holding in, he may sometimes introduce the important subject in such places and companies, as may appear unseasonable and improper. But every man is concerned in it: very few are duly sensible of its importance, and of their own danger: and those scenes of amusement and pleasure, which engross the time, the thoughts, and affections of the young and gay, are proofs what need they have of being “warned to “flee from the wrath to come.” But that “covetousness,” to which elder persons are addicted, is a more dangerous obstruction to the care of the soul, than the diversions of children, or even the dissipated pleasures of youth. If we judge of this vice by the word of God, we shall find immense multitudes, in every rank of life, given up to it: and too often we shall have to lament, that even the ministers of religion are by it induced to deal unfaithfully and falsely, in the most sacred concerns and transactions, which involve the most awful responsibility. Many are so taken up with forming connexions, and seeking preferment, that they neglect the study of the scriptures, and the discharge of their duty; they adopt smooth, fashionable, soothing systems of divinity: like unskilful surgeons, they heal every wound slightly; either because through negligence or pride they know no better; or because they do not choose to avow sentiments unfavourable to their interests, or to utter things grating to the ears of their generous patrons. Thus, they speak “Peace, peace, when there is no “peace:” but what a dreadful account will be at last required of them!—Whilst sinners are ashamed of the abominations, which they have committed, their case is hopeful: but when they are incapable of blushing, and can “glory in their shame,” they ripen apace for destruction.

V. 16—30.

If we would learn the safe and happy path, amidst the discordant opinions that prevail on every side; let us look well to our steps, put ourselves in the way of instruction, ask wisdom of God, and reduce what we know to practice: especially let us diligently enquire for the old paths, in which patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and other honoured servants of God, have walked, and which they have pointed out to others. (Notes, Heb. xi. xii. 1.) Following their steps we cannot fail of finding “rest to “our souls.” But many know nothing of these ways, and take no pains to enquire after them: many prefer modern improvements and discoveries: nay, many treat these ancient ways, as novel inventions, and enthusiastical reveries; and others who have some speculative knowledge of them, do not walk in them. But if men will not obey the voice of God, nor take warning when his watchmen sound the alarm, nor flee to his appointed refuge; it will appear at the day of judgment to all the world, that their ruin originated from their own wicked thoughts, because they would not hearken unto the words of God, but rejected them. Nor can any man reasonably expect, that the Lord should accept the most costly oblations or services, which are offered in impenitence, or in proud contempt of the sacrifice and intercession of our great High Priest. To such men, even this “tried Foundation” becomes “a Rock of offence:” every doctrine, and ordinance, and providential dispensation, concurs in blinding and hardening them to their perdition: and thus unbelievers will perish together, being unable to help one another. They despise indeed the distant report, both of temporal judgments and of eternal punishment; but their near approach will soon cause their courage to fail, and then anguish will seize upon them: for the sword of the most cruel enemy is as nothing, in comparison of the final wrath of almighty God. (Note, Ps. xc. 11.) In short, sinners must lament and mourn, either here in penitent sorrow and self-abasement; or hereafter with doleful, unavailing, and eternal “wailing and gnashing of “teeth.” If the bold and faithful ministers of God are not instrumental to the conversion of those whom they address; they will be found unanswerable witnesses against them, and men will be judged and condemned according to their word. And when warnings, corrections, rebukes, and every means of grace, leave men unrenewed; they will be left as rejected of God to everlasting contempt and misery.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1, 2. This chapter begins a new prophecy, which seems to have been delivered some time after the preceding. The prophet was commanded to station himself in the entrance of the temple, and there to proclaim his message to all those, who came thither to worship, probably, on some of the solemn feast-days. This must have given great offence to the chief priests, and to those who had authority in ecclesiastical concerns. (Notes, xxvi. 2—9. Matt. xxi. 23—46. Acts v. 17—28.)

V. 3, 4. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5—15.) The people gloried and trusted in the temple of JEHOVAH, even when they were given up to idolatry and wickedness: and when the prophets foretold judgments from God on the city and nation; they boasted that the temple, with its courts and solemnities, belonged to the Lord; and they were confident that he would spare the city on that account; and not suffer his sanctuary to be defiled by the heathen. Thus they “trusted in lying words,” which the false prophets spoke to them: as if they were so unalterably the favourites of heaven, that they might be sure of protection, whatever wickedness they committed.—The three-fold repetition seems only to mark the rash and presumptuous confidence of those who used the words. (Notes, xviii. 18. Is. xvi. 1, 2. Mic. iii. 8—12. Acts vi. 9—14, vv. 13, 14. vii. 4—50. xxi. 27—30.)

V. 5—7. As the omniscient God foresaw, that the Jews could not thus repent, and amend their lives; the absolute predictions of desolating judgments were in no wise consistent with these conditional promises. It was their undeniable duty, “thoroughly to amend their ways and their doings,” and to “do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God;” and it was peculiarly honourable to him, thus to hold out encouragements to them, in case they attended to his exhortations.—The prescience or decrees of God cannot be the rule or motive of man's duty: and the exhortations, promises, and threatenings, should always be considered, as abstracted from that incomprehensible subject; because this is the scriptural and rational way of stating the matter: for “the secret things” belong unto the LORD our God; but those things which “are revealed belong to us, and to our children for ever, “that we may do all the words of this law.” (Note, Deut. xxix. 29.)—Amend, &c. (5) “Make good your ways.” These had been very bad. (Marg. Ref.—Note, ii. 33—37.)—For ever and ever. (7) Note, Gen. xvii. 7, 8.

V. 8—11. (Note, Ez. xxiii. 39.) The Jews acted, as if God had delivered and protected them, that they might have the opportunity of committing every kind of abomination: thus men sometimes appear very penitent, when they are sick and think themselves near death; but when they recover, they return to wickedness, as if they supposed that God had restored them for that purpose. Or, they thought, that an attendance on the worship at the temple had delivered them from the guilt of their past sins, and that they might now without concern return to their idolatries and iniquities: as some men task themselves with fastings and devotions, and come to the Lord's table; that having, as they think, settled the old account, they may return to their former course of life without scruple, till the next reckoning day. Or, they prayed, “Deliver us, that we may do all these abominations.” This was the real import of their devotions. Thus they made the house of God a den of robbers, by frequenting it in the midst of their unrepented frauds, oppressions, murders, adulteries, perjuries, and idolatries; and yet they thought, that the temple, which they so scandalously profaned, would be their protection! (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. xxi. 12, 13. John ii. 14—17.)—I have seen, &c. (11) Notes. Ps. xciv. 8, 9. Mal. iii. 5, 6, c. 5.

V. 12—15. The tabernacle and ark of God had been long stationed at Shiloh; till at length the impiety of Eli's sons, and the wickedness of the people, provoked God to give up the ark into captivity: then it was finally removed from Shiloh, which was afterwards reduced or desolated. (Notes, Josh. xviii. 1. 1 Sam. ii. 13—16. 22—34. iv. 3—18. Ps. lxxviii. 56—69.)—Probably, Shiloh was wholly destroyed when the ten tribes were carried captive. Yet the inhabitants of that city had had as good ground to presume, that God would preserve them for the sake of his sanctuary, as the inhabitants of Jerusalem now had; especially as the latter were become still more abandoned than they, in the midst of more abundant means and advantages. Accordingly, the Lord assured them, that he would deal with Jerusalem, as he had dealt with Shiloh; destroying the temple, removing all the sacred utensils, and utterly desolating the city: and that he would drive the inhabitants out of their favoured land, into heathen countries, as he had done the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel; banishing them, as it were, from the sight of his eyes. (Note, Deut. xi. 12. Is. i. 1—3.)—“Rising up early” (13) signifies diligence and assiduity. The same sense is elsewhere expressed in the Hebrew by doing any thing in the morning; which our translators render early, Ps. xlv. 5. xc. 14. Lowth. (Notes, xxv. 3. Is. i. 4.)

V. 16. The prophet, hoping that the threatenings were not absolute, continued to intercede for the people. But the Lord not only said to him, “Let me alone;” (Notes, Ex. xxxii. 7—10, v. 10;) but he absolutely forbade him to pray for them any more, for he would not hear him; nor would he have him pray in vain. (Notes, xiv. 7—12. xv. 1. Ez. xiv. 13—21.) He might pray for the conversion and salvation of individuals; for the mitigation of national judgments; for the preservation of the Jews during the captivity, and for their restoration: but he was not allowed any more to deprecate the destruction of the city and temple, the desolations of the land, and the captivity of the people. (Note, 5—7.)—“Nothing but an universal reformation, which God foresaw would not be effected, could deliver the Jews from ... captivity and desolation. ... The divine decree, being without repentance irrevocable, iv. 28. xiv. 11, 12, God forbids Jeremiah to interpose by his prayers for the reversing of it.” Lowth.

V. 17, 18. To convince the prophet, that the irreversible sentence was most just, the Lord calls his attention to the unanimous zeal of old and young, men and women, for their abominable idolatries. (Notes, xlv. 15—18. Lev. ii. 4—8. Num. xxviii. 5—7.)

Queen of heaven. (18) This may be understood of the moon, or of the whole frame of the visible heavens, of which the people had some image or symbol, that they worshipped with great earnestness. (Notes, Deut. iv. 19. Job xxxi. 24—28.)—Some think, that the cakes here mentioned, were stamped with the likeness of the idol, to which they were offered.—It is remarkable that the papists have adopted this title in the worship of the Virgin Mary, styling her ‘The queen of heaven;’ as if they were ambitious of resembling the Jews in their idolatry.

V. 19. The people committed wickedness, as if they meant it on purpose to affront the Lord (18): but did they think they could do him any real harm? Or could they expect any other, than to expose themselves by it to confusion and misery? (Notes, Ez. viii. 17, 18. 1 Cor. x. 18—22.)

V. 21—23. The Jews confided in their sacrifices, especially the burnt-offerings, which were wholly consumed on

22 For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them, in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices:

23 But this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people: and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well unto you.

24 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear, but walked in the counsels, and in the imagination of their evil heart, and went backward, and not forward.

25 Since the day that your fathers came forth out of the land of Egypt unto this day, I have even sent unto you all my servants the prophets, daily rising up early and sending them:

dened their neck: they did worse than their fathers.

27 Therefore thou shalt speak all these words unto them; but they will not hearken to thee: thou shalt also call unto them; but they will not answer thee.

28 But thou shalt say unto them, This is a nation that obeyeth not the voice of the LORD their God, nor receiveth correction: truth is perished, and is cut off from their mouth.

29 ¶ Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away, and take up a lamentation on high places: for the LORD hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath.

30 For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the LORD: they have set their abominations in the house which is called by my name, to pollute it.

31 And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the val-

the altar, (Notes, Lev. i;) as if by them they made the Lord their debtor. But he indignantly bade them take these and add them to the peace-offerings, on which the priests and offerers feasted; (Notes, Lev. vii. 12—18. Deut. xii. 5—7;) for he would not accept them at their hands. It was the grand design of the whole revelation to Israel at Mount Sinai, to lead the people to obedience, and the sacrifices were appointed in subserviency to that end: and not merely as external observances, pleasing to God, however offered, or by men of any character. They were in themselves instances of obedience; they formed an expression of the offerer's repentance, and faith in the promised Saviour; and they were 'means of grace,' and of communion with God; all which, when genuine, conduced to the conscientious obedience of holy fear and love. In this way the Lord would have been their God, and they would have been his people: but all their external observances must be worthless, when this obedience was wanting. (Notes, Sam. xv. 22, 23. Ps. l. 7—15. Is. i. 10—15. lxvi. 3, 4. Hos. vi. 6. viii. 13. Am. v. 21—24. Mark xii. 28—34.)—Concerning. (22) Or, "For the sake of, &c." This the Lord properly signifies.

V. 24—28. The prophet ought not to be discouraged, if his labours were singularly unsuccessful: for the people had always been disobedient and obstinate, notwithstanding all the means which God, by his servants the prophets had perseveringly used to reclaim them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, Zeph. iii. 5—7. Zech. i. 2—6.)—The command given to Jeremiah to speak all the words of God to his people, though previously assured that they would not believe and obey them, shews that intreaties, exhortations, and expostulations, are in no wise consistent with the prescience of God, that men will not regard them; nor with his decree to "give them up to their own hearts' lusts." Such protestations, indeed, tend eventually to manifest the divine justice in pouring out his vengeance on hardened rebels, and answer most important purposes in the moral government of God.

They went backward, &c. (24) 'The expression is taken from headstrong oxen, that draw back and refuse to put their necks under the yoke. 26. Neh. ix. 29. Hos. iv. 16.' Lowth.—Worse, &c. (26) Note, 30.—Truth is perished. (28) Notes, v. 1, 2. ix. 3—6. Is. lix. 9—15.

V. 29. The hair of the Nazarites was the token of their peculiar dedication to the Lord, which was terminated or profaned, when it was cut off: (Notes, Num. vi. 2—5. 9—12. 18—20. Judg. xvi. 17—21;) and cutting or shaving the hair was in all cases a token of grief and humiliation. (Marg. Ref. 1.) Thus Jerusalem was ordered to cut off her hair, as about to be profaned and trodden down by the Gentiles: she was also to use every token of deep distress; for that generation of Israel would endure the severe wrath of God, and be rejected and forsaken by him. (Marg. Ref. m—o.)—This implied, that there was mercy in reserve for future generations of that people. (Notes, Num. xiv. 22—31.)

High places. מַצְבֵּי. "The open plains." Blayney. The word seems to mean a place, which is without covert, unsheltered, exposed to open view; whether on a hill, or in an open plain or desert. (Note, iv. 11—13, v. 11.)

V. 30. Manasseh placed his idols in the courts of the temple, nay, in the temple itself! (Marg. Ref.—26. Notes, 2 Kings xxi. 4, 5, 7, 8. xxiii. 4. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 6—8. Ez. viii. 2—12.)

might have had some excuse for renouncing his worship. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The great doctrines and precepts of the scriptures should be proclaimed in the most publick manner; and those who are employed in this service, must not fear the faces or respect the persons of men, whatever be their rank or office.—Faithful preaching ought to attend on the administration of other sacred ordinances; that men may be warned not to rest in forms, and to beware of irreverence and hypocrisy.—No observances, creeds, or experiences, in which men glory and confide, will profit them; if they do not sincerely and thoroughly amend their ways and doings. They may in various ways “trust in lying words,” and in the words of lying teachers, presuming themselves to be the people of God, and entitled to all the blessings of his covenant; whilst they neglect justice and equity, oppress the stranger, the fatherless, and widow, or commit other atrocious crimes: but if God would not suffer Israel to inhabit Canaan, when they thus abused their privileges; will he admit those into heaven who copy their example? He graciously pardons and saves the most atrocious criminals, who embrace his gospel; and his “saving grace teaches “them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live “soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;” but no one can have any ground to deem himself a partaker of this salvation, who allows himself in the practice of one known sin, or the habitual neglect of one known duty. But presumptuous hypocrites deny, overlook, or evade these conclusions, by various subterfuges; and they shift from one delusion to another, as times and circumstances change. The legal Pharisee, for instance, pays a sort of quit-rent to the Lord, by a task of austerity or devotion; and thus he purchases the liberty, as he supposes, to live the rest of his time according to his own plan. And many of this description, after all their sanctimonious scrupulosity, will cheat, lie, perjure, commit adultery, or any other wickedness, which they hope may escape detection and punishment from man. The evangelical Pharisee, and antinomian enthusiast, receive a mutilated and distorted evangelical creed, into a carnal heart: they contend earnestly for the doctrines of free grace; they mistake some change of sentiment, or sect, or some lively impression on the imagination or affections, for “a new creation” unto holiness; they call the most open apostasy, “backsliding;” or the most notorious and unrepented vices, “the spots of “God’s children;” and then by perverting the doctrine of final perseverance, they hope to live the life of the wicked, and at last to “die the death of the righteous!” Thus men “sin on that grace may abound;” they think themselves delivered from wrath, to commit all kinds of abomination; and speak of the church of God, as if it were a den of robbers, and adulterers, and covetous oppressors, or of contentious, and ill tempered neighbours and relatives! Those who are not conversant with such matters, can scarcely deem it possible, that men should hold such impious sentiments: yet it is, alas! too true that many do; and it is no more incredible, than that the Jews should come from their idols and wicked practices, to the temple of God, and then be confident of his protection, because his ordinances were thus profaned among them! If any thing could break this “strong delusion,” the dealings of God with his ancient people might teach men another lesson: but the cross of Christ, when duly understood, forms the most effectual antidote to these detestable sentiments. Did the Son of God then indeed give himself for our transgressions, to shew the justice and holiness of God, the excellency and obligation of the violated law and the evil and desert of sin? and was this in order to give his followers leave to commit sin with impunity? Who can adequately abhor such a thought!

33 And ^y the carcasses of this people shall be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth; and none shall fray them away.

V. 16—34.

When the professed worshippers of God have been deluded into a vain imagination, that the practice of allowed sin, and the enjoyment of the divine favour may, by some means or other, be reconciled; they are seldom recovered: We are not indeed forbidden to pray for any person, or people, by name: yet there are some, respecting whom we feel discouragement, whenever we attempt to plead in their behalf; as if the Lord said to us, “Make no intercession for them, for I will not hear thee.” (Note, 1 John v. 16—18, v. 16.)—Whatever enormity we witness in the conduct of the ignorant and profane, there remains hope concerning them: but presumptuous professors of religion, who commit and plead for sin, must in general be let alone. If, however, they will learn nothing from us; we may learn from them, “whilst we think we stand, to take heed lest we fall:” and to be as diligent and as careful in instructing our children in the truths of God, and in habituating them to attend on divine ordinances, as they often are, in initiating them in the mysteries of iniquity.—Hardened sinners often delight in shewing their contempt of God, as if this could interrupt his happiness, when it only provokes him to hasten and enhance their misery. Nothing can avert the ruin of those who persist in disobedience: and we understand the gospel as little, as the Jews did the law; if we think that a notional belief and a high confidence that we are the people of God, can avail us, if we persist in rebellion; or that he will accept any particular services, which are intended as compensations for continuing in the practice of some beloved iniquity. The way is indeed open for the sinner to return: and when we are brought to obey the gospel, all former offences are pardoned, imperfect services are accepted, the Lord becomes our God, and numbers us among his people; we learn to walk in his ways, and “it is well with us;” his gospel furnishes us with motives, encouragements, and assistance; and his ordinances are means of grace to our souls. But he abhors external services, when men continue to follow their own counsels, to walk after their own evil imaginations; and when they grow worse in the midst of opportunities of improvement.—The minister must speak all the message of God, though men will not hear: he must call on them to repent, and invite them to come to Christ, even could he know that they would reject his message: and when individuals or nations cast off the authority of God, and “refuse correction;” or become so addicted to dissimulation and hypocrisy, that “truth perisheth, and is cut off from their mouth;” their guilt should be charged home upon them, and warning given to them and to others.—The Lord hates sin the most, when it is nearest to him; and the profanation of his solemn ordinances is the worst of all impiety.—If men were required to endure such losses, hardships, weariness, or expense, in the service of God, as they often impose on themselves in their sinful pursuits, they would complain bitterly of his commandments. But they are frequently cruel to themselves, their families, and children; they ruin their health or circumstances, and act contrary to natural affection, without complaining, when serving sin and Satan.—All the precepts and prohibitions of the Lord are “holy, just, and good;” and the self-denial which he requires, rational and salutary. But the devil is a cruel tyrant as a tempter in this world: what then will he be, as a tormentor in the next? There all joy will for ever cease from the workers of iniquity. May we then learn to relish holy and spiritual joys, and to sit loose to all other satisfactions, however lawful in themselves.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. When the Chaldeans had taken Jerusalem, without doubt they accomplished this prediction: and being enraged at the Jews, especially at the rulers and teachers, who had violated their treaties, and made so obstinate a resistance; they absurdly vented their indignation, by abusing the bodies of the dead, as well as by massacring the living. Thus the bones of the principal persons especially were taken from the graves, and spread before the sun, moon, and stars: and they were disgraced, and left as dung on the earth; (Notes, xxii. 13—19, v. 19. xxxvi. 30, 31. 1 Kings xxi. 23. 2 Kings ix. 30—37, vv. 35—37. Is. xiv. 16—20;) as it were, in the presence of those creatures, whom they had worshipped and served, instead of the great Creator. Their idolatry is spoken of in a variety of phrases of similar import, to 4 ¶ Moreover thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD; Shall they fall, and not arise? shall he turn away, and not return?

5 Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding? they hold fast deceit, they refuse to return.

6 I¹ hearkened and heard, but they spake not aright: no man repented him of his wickedness, saying, What have I done? Every one turned to his course, as the horse rusheth into the battle.

7 Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the LORD.

8 How do ye say, We are wise, and the law of the LORD is with us? Lo, certainly in vain made he it; the pen of the scribes is in vain.

9 The wise men are ashamed, they are dismayed and taken: lo, they have rejected the word of the LORD; and what wisdom is in them?

10 Therefore will I give their wives unto others, and their fields to them that shall inherit them: for every one, from the least even unto the greatest, shew their excessive attachment to it. And the remains of Israel, (no more worthy to be called “a holy nation,” but an “evil family,”) being dispersed into distant countries, would encounter such miseries, as would cause them to envy those, who were slain at the taking of the city. (Notes, Lam. iv. 6—9. Rev. ix. 6.)—Some think that the Chaldeans broke open the monuments of the great men, in searching for the treasures, which were supposed to be laid up in them.—The latter part of the second verse might be rendered, “Because they loved them, and “because they served them, &c.” They were thus disgraced, by the just judgment of God, for their idolatry.

V. 4—7. ‘Some explain the fourth verse to this sense: ‘Are they so far plunged in sins, and the miseries consequent thereto, that there is no hope of their recovery? ... ‘If they will turn to God, will not he immediately be pacified and return to them?’ Lowth. The same word is in that verse rendered turn and return; but if a man have turned out of the way, he must turn again, in order to return into it: so that the same sense is preserved, by the interpretation given below, which seems most agreeable to the context, and the scope of the prophet’s keen expositions. If men fall into a pit, or fall down by the road, they attempt to rise again, and are glad of assistance: when they fall into trouble, they endeavour to extricate themselves: and if a traveller have lost his way, he will bear to be told of his mistake, and be ready to ask for information, and to return back to the road. Why then did the people of Jerusalem persist in apostasy from God? Why were they so obstinate in idolatry, notwithstanding all the methods used to reclaim them? It was undeniable, that they were fallen into sin and misery: and yet they held fast the delusion, and could not be induced to return to the worship and service of God! They were fallen into a pit, and would not attempt to get out of it! they had wandered from the way, and would not attempt to return to it! The Lord had his eye upon them in all their trials; but saw no man who spake aright, and as it became sinners in such circumstances. None of them repented of their sins, or condemned themselves for their rebellion, ingratitude, and folly. On the contrary, every one of them returned to his sinful practices, as eagerly, and with as little regard to consequences, as the impetuous horse rushes into the battle. (Note, Job xxxix. 19—25.) Even the birds of passage knew the times, which Providence had appointed for their removal from one climate to another: but the Jews, more stupid than they, could not perceive “the signs of the times;” they did not see that the Lord was about to execute judgments, which could not be shunned, without repentance and conversion; indeed, they knew neither their duty, nor the rules of the Lord’s dealings with them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Prov. vi. 6—11. Is. i. 3.)

V. 8, 9. (Notes, Rom. ii. 17—23.) The Jews valued themselves upon their superior wisdom and knowledge, and upon having the law of God among them. But what ground had they for such glorying, when they were guilty of the most atrocious idolatry and iniquity? They might as well have been left in ignorance, with the poor Gentiles. The Lord had given the law, and the scribes laboured in writing copies of it, and expounding it, to no purpose, if obedience was not rendered to it. Indeed their politicians and counsellors, could not prevent the ruin of the state: they would be frustrated in all their devices, put to shame, dismayed, ensnared, and taken prisoners. For what wisdom could be in such men, as rejected the truths, precepts, and warnings of God’s word? (Note, Is. viii. 20.) ‘The title ‘of Scribe, as applied to the skill of transcribing or interpreting the law, is first given to Ezra; (Ezra vii. 6;) ‘who was not merely a copier of the law, but likewise an ‘explainer of the difficulties of it. (Neh. viii. 9. 13.) And ‘it is likely none made it their business to write copies of ‘the law, but those who were well versed in the study of ‘it; which would best secure them from committing mistakes in their copies: from hence the word signifies, in ‘the New Testament, those who were learned in explaining the law.’ Lowth. (Notes, xxxvi. 4. Ezra vii. 6—10. Neh. viii. 1—13. Matt. xiii. 51, 52.)—As Ezra lived long after Jeremiah; the quotation can refer only to the order of books in our Bibles.—The word (שָׂרֵף), rendered “in vain,” generally signifies “a lie;” (“dealeth falsely,” the same word, 10;) and perhaps it refers to the false interpretations of the scribes. (Notes, Matt. xv. 1—6.)

Given to covetousness. (10) One effect of covetousness, in the ministers of religion, (Note, vi. 13—15. P. O. 10—15,) may here be noticed; and it is too important to be omitted: namely, that of those, in highly responsible stations in the church, who appropriate to the emolument of their own families and connexions, what was entrusted to their stewardship for the common benefit of the souls of men.

V. 13. This verse may be literally translated, “In gathering I will consume them, saith JEHOVAH. There are no grapes on the vine; no figs on the fig-tree; the very leaf is fallen; and what I gave them shall pass away from them.” Israel was a vine, or fig-tree: but there was no fruit on the vine, or fig-tree, even the profession of true religion was cast off; and therefore God would take away from the people all the peculiar advantages, which he had afforded them. (Notes, Is. v. 1—7. Matt. xxi. 17—20. 33—44. xxv. 24—30. Luke xiii. 6—9.)

V. 14—16. The Jews are again introduced, conferring together on the report of the Chaldean invasion as already arrived. They excited one another without delay to leave the villages and open country, that they might take refuge in the defenced cities; and there remain silent and inactive, resistance seemed hopeless: for they saw the hand of God in the visitation, and this damped their expectations and enervated their efforts; as he had, for their sins, given them water mingled with gall, hemlock, or poison, to drink. (V. 15. Notes, xxiii. 13—15. xxv. 15—17. Deut. xxix. 18. lxxv. 8.) This may be considered either as the language of the remnant, who humbled themselves under the afflicting hand of God; or of those, who counted him their inexorable enemy, and sat down in sullen despondency. (Am. vi. 9—11.) The former had hoped, that their brethren would have joined with them in repentance and prayer, and that the storm would have thus been averted: the latter, through their own presumption and the deception of their false prophets, had expected peace and deliverance, when these desolating judgments came upon them.—The snorting of the horses in the Chaldean army, being heard in the northern extremity of the land, terror would soon diffuse itself in every place, and speedily be followed by tremendous devastations; not only in the open country, but in Jerusalem itself.—This last verse is awfully sublime. (Note, iv. 19—27.)—‘Nebuchadnezzar, having subdued Phenicia, passed through the tribe of Dan, in his way to Jerusalem.’ Blayney. (Notes, i. 13, 14. Judg. xviii. 7—10, v. 7.)

V. 17. The Chaldeans are here represented as pestiferous serpents, on account of their motives and conduct in this invasion, and of its fatal effects upon the Jews. The invaders were so cruel, subtle, and malicious, and so intent upon the spoil, that they were deaf to all arguments and intreaties; nothing could mollify them, or interrupt their progress, or escape their ravages. (Note, Ps. lviii. 3—5.)—Serpents. נחשים Gen. iii. 1. Heb.

V. 18, 19. The prophet complains, that his heart was ready to faint under the pressure of his sorrow: he had endeavoured to comfort himself in submission to the will of God: but Jerusalem and her inhabitants, exposed to be plundered and massacred, continually haunted his imagination, and the cries of the sufferers seemed to sound in his ears. Even before these calamities arrived,

^v See on 5, 6.—King in her? ^y Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images, and with strange vanities? ^z 20 The ^a harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved. ^a 21 For ^a the hurt of the daughter of the people distressed him by enquiring, whether JEHOVAH did not inhabit Zion; and whether their king were not of David's line, and of God's own appointment: or, whether God himself, the King of Israel, was not in her. (Notes, Is. xii. 4—6. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. ii. 10—13. ix. 9, 10.) How then could he leave his city to be profaned and spoiled by idolaters? Would not this dishonour his great name?—In answer to this the LORD demands, why the Jews had renounced his worship, and provoked him to anger with their multiplied idolatries and lying vanities, invented in foreign countries. They had broken the covenant and defiled the city and temple, and his honour required him to execute condign punishment on them.—‘The words may be rendered, more agreeably to the Hebrew thus: “The voice of the cry of the daughter of “my people, from a land afar off.” ... So that the prophet represents the doleful complaints of the Jews, ‘under a state of captivity, as if God had quite forsaken ‘and disowned them. ... “But why have ye provoked “me? &c.”’ Lowth.—The instruction is the same, whether our translation be adhered to, or this be adopted.

V. 20. The people seem here to speak. When pressed closely by the siege, they had waited for deliverance in vain. The Egyptians had been expected to come to their relief: but the harvest and the summer were past, and they were not delivered; so that immediate destruction now stared them in the face. (Notes, Luke xix. 41—44. Heb. iii. 7—13.)

V. 21, 22. The prophet here tenderly sympathized with his people in their troubles; for he was melancholy, disconsolate, and stupified with astonishment. He saw the nation lying in the condition of a man expiring of wounds, to which no proper remedy was applied: yet as Gilead produced medicinal balm, (Marg. Ref. c,) and there were physicians, or surgeons, who had skill to use it for healing wounds; so, in this case likewise, effectual relief might be obtained. The Lord was ever ready to deliver his people, when they returned to him; his mercy and grace were proposed to all who sought them; and his prophets were sent to exhort and instruct them. Why then did they remain in so hopeless a condition? Because they were set against their only remedy and Physician, and were vainly employed in seeking help in other ways, and from other quarters.—“I am black;” I look ghastly, as those who ‘are dying. ... God had sent his prophets, as so many spiritual physicians; and they had given the best advice: ‘but the fault lay wholly in the patients themselves, who ‘refused to submit to their prescriptions.’ Lowth.—The wickedness and negligence of the rulers and priests might likewise be assigned as a reason. (Notes, vi. 13—15, v. 14. xxx. 12—18, vv. 13, 14. Is. i. 5, 6. 21—24.)—It is not agreed what kind of gum is meant by the balm of Gilead: but it was considered in those days as a very efficacious healing medicine.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The Lord can employ the most ferocious conduct of insulting victors to execute his own righteous purposes: and, though no real harm can be done to a dead body; yet, when ringleaders in atrocious crimes are disgraced after death, it has a tendency to impress terror on the minds of survivors; and it affectingly teaches us, that the vengeance of God after death is most to be dreaded. This will be executed without respect of persons; and those who have abused superior talents and done the most mischief, will have the largest share of contempt and misery.—The example even of zealous idolaters may instruct us, how we ought to love and serve, to walk with, obey, imitate, seek after, and worship the Lord our God, as our one great privilege, business, and delight. But, as the conduct of mankind is generally the reverse of this, we need not wonder that his jealous indignation renders them miserable even in this world. Thus many are led to prefer a hopeless death to a joyless life; and then rashly and rebelliously to rush into the presence of their angry Judge, with all their unrepented sins upon their heads, even by the commission of another most atrocious crime! But, whatever comes upon us here, let us humble ourselves before God, “submit to his righteousness,” and seek his mercy. Then we shall be enabled to “possess our souls in patience,” and to wait the appointed season of deliverance; then we shall be willing to live, though afflicted, and yet “count it far “better to depart, and to be with Christ.” (Note, Phil. i. 21—26.)—But men do not act in the concerns of their souls as in other matters. They fall into sin and suffer for it; they are consumed with terrors; and they are conscious that they are in the road to misery, and not felicity: yet they will use no proper means of escape! Nay, they are affronted by the offer of help or counsel! They rush into dissipation to banish reflection, and strive to forget present sorrows by ensuring severer in future! Thus men depart from God “with a perpetual backsliding:” when they can find a soothing delusion, either by infidelity, or some false system of religion, “they hold fast the deceit “and refuse to return.” In this way many professors of the gospel turn aside, and “their last state is worse than “the first.” So that, after all the warnings and invitations of the sacred oracles, and the present painful effects of men's sins, even the all penetrating eye of God sees no man disposed of himself to true repentance; but many return, even after convictions, to their evil courses, with the most irrational impetuosity. Yet some do speak aright; do examine, judge, and condemn themselves; repent, forsake their sins, and do works meet for repentance: they “work out their own salvation with fear and trembling; “for it is God worketh in them to will and to do, of his “good pleasure.” If then one thought or desire of es-

CHAP. IX.

The prophet shews the excess of his grief for the miseries of his people, and his abhorrence of their crimes; and also the justice of God in his dealings with them, 1—16. He calls them to lamentation, 17—22. Warnings not to glory in wisdom, strength, riches, or external distinctions, but in the knowledge of God, and of his grace, 23, 24. caping the wrath of God be excited in any person's mind, it should be turned into a prayer, that 'God would give him repentance and his Holy Spirit,' that he may be made wise unto salvation. For though many boast of religious knowledge, and value themselves on being acquainted with the scriptures; yet, except taught by the Spirit of God, the instinct of brutes will prove a far surer guide, than man's supposed wisdom: for the most sagacious in other respects act foolishly in the most important concerns, and know not aright the truths, precepts, or ordinances of God; they neither profit by the dispensations of Providence, nor prepare for the judgment to come. When we see, how men oppose, neglect, abuse, or despise the scriptures; we may sometimes be ready to conclude, that they were given in vain, and that preachers and expositors labour to no purpose. Yet, while many "wrest them to their own destruction," others are "made wise to salvation." But there is nothing worthy of the name of wisdom in those who reject revelation: and they will soon be ashamed of all the systems which they now adopt; they will be dismayed at the approach of those judgments, which they now deride; and find themselves caught in a snare, of which they now have no conception.—Selfish teachers indeed speak in a more soothing strain, and promise "peace when there is no peace:" thus men encourage each other in committing abomination without shame or fear; but, "in the day of visitation," their abused plenty will be torn from them, and they will have no refuge to flee to.

V. 13—22.

Happy are they, who by calamities, or by any means, are brought to be silent in submission and self-abasement before God: (Note, Ez. xvi. 60—63, v. 63:) for all, who are not thus humbled, will be silenced before his judgment-seat, and made to drink the water of gall for their sins. (Note, Rom. iii. 19, 20.)—While transgressors look for peace and prosperity, sudden destruction overtakes them: and there will be no charming or escaping the executioners of divine vengeance; no comforting of themselves under these sorrows. But, however the servants of God may grieve for the miseries, which they foresee coming upon those whom they love; they will soon be satisfied with the reasons of the divine conduct, and "their sorrow will be turned into joy."—The justice of God is peculiarly manifest in the punishment of those who deem themselves secured, by the engagements of the new covenant and their relation to God; whilst they idolize the world and are slaves to their lusts.—As salvation by Christ can only be found in this life, so the present opportunity should be seized; lest at the hour of death, or the day of judgment, any should dolefully exclaim, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."—The Lord hath graciously become our Physician; and the blood of Christ, and the influences of the Holy Spirit are more effectual to heal the wounded conscience, and the distempered heart, than any medicines to cure the diseases of the body. Why then are sinners not healed? Is there no Saviour, no Sanctifier? Alas! they deem themselves whole, or are in love with their disease, or hate the Physician and his means of cure, or employ "physicians of no value," and madly attempt other methods of recovery. Thus they die unpardoned and unchanged; for they will not come to Christ for life and salvation. (Note, Matt. ix. 10—13, v. 12.)

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. The prophet did not think himself sufficiently affected by the foresight of the miseries, which he was sent to predict: he longed to be more deeply and evidently impressed and in earnest; and by the excess of his sorrow to shew the people his assured belief of what he spake, and his tender love for them, and to affect them by his example. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) He therefore pathetically exclaimed, 'Oh, that one would grant me, (marg.) that my head were a well of waters, and mine eyes as fountains, whence tears might flow without intermission, for the calamities which I foresee can never be sufficiently lamented.' 'The same word in the Hebrew signifies both 'the eye, and a fountain: as if, in this land of sorrows, 'our eyes were designed rather for weeping, than seeing.' Henry.—At the same time the prophet spake with equal energy of his abhorrence of their crimes. "Dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing," he "vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds," by which God was dishonoured, and vengeance was brought down upon them. He would therefore have preferred some mean hut in the wilderness, erected by travellers for a temporary accommodation, or the life of a hermit, to his present situation; had not his duty made it necessary for him to continue among them.—'The prophet sheweth the great compassion, that he had toward his people;...which is a 'special note to discern the true pastors from the hirelings.' (Notes, viii. 21, 22. xiii. 15—17, v. 17. Luke xix. 41—44. Rom. ix. 1—3.) The word adulterers may mark, either the licentiousness, or the idolatry, of the people; or both combined, which was generally the case.

V. 3—6. The people cultivated the art of lying, as men prepare bows and arrows for war. (Note, Ps. lii. 3—5.) They habituated their tongues to lies, that they might utter them, without hesitation and with confidence: they devised ingenious methods of deception, and strove to get over the restraints of shame and conscience. They were ambitious of being adepts in the whole system of dissimulation, and were continually employed in slander, flattery, cheating, and over-reaching. They were very bold in this work, and sought to obtain authority by these base practices; instead of being valiant for the truths of God, or in maintaining truth and justice in judicial proceedings. They were indefatigable in committing iniquity, and mutual deceit and fraud were so universal, that the nearest relations and neighbours could not safely trust one another.—Whilst the prophet thus complained of his people, the Lord himself spake, and allowed that his servant's dwelling was in the midst of deceit and lies, and that he was on that account despised and hated: but he might be patient in his situation, when he considered, that, through the same deceit, the people were resolved not to know God, and despised him even more than his prophet. They trusted to lies for safety; they hated the holy perfections, truths, and precepts of God, because contrary to their own character and conduct: they "loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil;" they preferred any worthless idol and superstition to God and his worship: and their religion was wholly hypocrisy (8).

Walk with slanders. (4) 'They who sow contentions and calumnies, walk about the houses of their neighbours, to examine, whether they can see or hear aught which they may report in the street.' (Notes, Lev. xix. 16. Prov. xi. 13. xviii. 8.)

Through deceit, &c. (6) 'It is natural for those, that are resolved at all events to abide in their evil courses, to endeavour, if possible, to divest themselves of all religious principles; which, if insufficient to restrain, will be sure at least to be very troublesome to them. For this cause, they are ready to "say unto God, Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Job xxi. 14.' Blayney. (Notes, Rom. i. 28—32.)

V. 7. In this corrupt state of the whole nation, the only one on earth in which the name of God was known and worshipped, what did it behove him to do? It would have been very dishonourable to him to connive at their wickedness: yet he would not be without a church on earth; and his engagements, to Abraham and David, forbade him utterly to cast off the nation, before the coming of the Messiah. He was therefore determined to cast them into the furnace, to melt, prove, and refine the mass; which would be attended with the destruction of immense multitudes, consumed as dross. But it would refine a small number, from whom he would raise up a purer church for the honour of his name.—'What can I do else for my people; but by all means try to save them from the common destruction?' Lowth. Thus death is here spoken of as a person, that entered by the windows to destroy those, who were shut up in the houses and palaces; as well as cutting off the children found playing in the streets, and the young men from their places of resort. others, and entitled to applause, respect, or admiration; on which they congratulate themselves; which they make the subject of their boastings; and from which they expect safety and felicity. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) Thus the Jews were prone to glory in their prudence, policy, valour, strength, or wealth, both as to their national and their personal concerns. But the Lord here solemnly warned them not to glory in these empty distinctions, which at all times were precarious and transient, and could little profit their possessors; and in their case, would only expose them very speedily to more complicated miseries, by rendering them the first objects of attention to the rapacious, revengeful, and cruel invaders. If however, any of them were disposed to glory; let him see to it, that he possessed a really valuable and honourable distinction, and ground of self-congratulation, and confident expectation of good. This no man could have, but he who knew the Lord, and by faith had become acquainted with his glorious perfections, and the methods of his dealings with mankind. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John xvii. 1—3.) ‘To have a serious sense of his mercies to the penitent, of his judgments to the obstinate, and of his truth and integrity in making good his promises and threatenings to both.’ Lowth. To have a genuine transforming knowledge of the eternal and glorious God, in the character of a merciful Father, and of a righteous Judge; and as exercising his abundant mercy and truth, in full harmony with his glorious justice and holiness, according to the wonderful plan devised by infinite wisdom, and revealed in his holy word; and as delighting in these displays of his perfections, and in seeing his creatures copy the example of his mercy, truth, purity, and righteousness: this formed the only distinction, in which any one could reasonably glory, as his inestimable privilege and happiness; because the only thing, which would secure his permanent, yea, eternal honour and felicity.—As God is thus known to sinners in and through Christ alone, the apostle applies this passage in its genuine meaning, when he speaks of believers glorying in him and his salvation. (Notes, Job xxxi. 24—28. Ps. xlix. 6—9. lii. 1. lxii. 8—10. Is. xlv. 23—25. 1 Cor. i. 26—31. Gal. vi. 11—14. Phil. iii. 1—7, v. 3.)

V. 25, 26. The Jews were especially prone to glory and confide in the external sign of circumcision: but the Lord here assures them, that he would entirely disregard this distinction, in the judgments about to be inflicted on the nations by the Chaldeans. Accordingly Judah seems purposely to be named betwixt Egypt and Edom, as no more entitled to the special benefits vouchsafed to the people of God, than those nations; because of the uncircumcision of their hearts, and their utter want of faith and love to him. The Septuagint instead of “Judah” read Idumea, though “Edom,” another name for the same people, follows directly! It seems these translators were unwilling to have Judah introduced in this connexion. (Notes, iv. 3, 4. Gen. xvii. 9—12. Lev. xxvi. 41, 42. Deut. x. 16. xxx. 1—

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

If ministers would have the people deeply affected, by their representations of the malignant nature and fatal consequences of sin, their conduct must manifest that their own hearts are suitably impressed with the subject, as well as full of tender sympathy with them in their sufferings, thus shewing that their severe rebukes and awful warnings spring from love, and not from resentment or moroseness. But they, who most lament the miseries which are coming on the wicked, are sensible that they ought to be far more deeply affected: and if they could “weep over them day and night,” it would not exceed the cause of sorrow, and would give emphasis to their exhortations and expostulations. Nay, the state of this world always suggests matter of lamentation; and a compassionate heart is ready to “take up a weeping and wailing” continually for the havock made among the human species by war, famines, pestilences, and other judgments, with which God visits guilty nations, turns cities into heaps, and desolates the countries. Yet we must adore the divine justice, and acquiesce in the divine will: and what we see, hear, and discover by careful investigation, of the conduct of mankind, even where favoured with revelation, will serve to explain these mysteries of Providence. Such scenes might also render us weary of human society, and lead us to prefer a lodging place in the wilderness: were we not conscious, that we must carry along with us, in our own hearts, an epitome of this wicked world; and that the powers of darkness would have access to us in every retirement. Even the desert would certainly be the scene of horrid temptations, abominable imaginations, and the most hateful affections, without communion with God through Jesus Christ, and the influences of the Holy Spirit: whereas, with these, we may live in purity and peace, amidst the wickedness of populous cities. Yet, the more holy a man is, the more painful will it be for him to witness the

impiety and wickedness of mankind: and when ministers see no success attend their labours, it is not wonderful that they are often desirous of relinquishing them. They are men of like passions with others: continual disappointment, in the leading desire of their hearts, is very painful; they cannot but feel the contempt and ill treatment, which they meet with for their plain-dealing; and though preserved from resentment, they must be grieved to be always giving offence, and rendering themselves obnoxious. It also distresses them to recollect, that they must prove the occasion of increasing the condemnation of those whose salvation they long after. But, whilst it is proper for them to express very strongly their sentiments on these subjects: it is generally best for them to abide in their place and work, and to leave the event with God. If their lot be cast where deceit and wickedness abound, they should protest against these evils by their example and their preaching: and in reproving sin, it is necessary to mention particulars, even in the detail, that their hearers may know themselves to be the persons concerned; whether they be living in adultery, or dishonesty, or avarice, or malice.—Whilst all men are offended at the imputation of being liars, all, in one way or other, have been guilty of lying; and multitudes in every rank of society use their tongues almost wholly for this purpose. The whole social intercourse of thousands and millions is a mere interchange of dissimulation: now they lavish deceitful compliments, professions, and panegyrics; and shortly they deviate as widely from the truth, in slander and back-biting, and perhaps in respect of the very same persons! In trade, a similar system of falsehood is prevalent; and buying and selling are often conducted by the same interchange of deceit, as visiting and conversation; but with still more atrocious iniquity. In short, men are every where seeking to accomplish their selfish designs by concealing them; and to prey on one another by fair professions, and with smiling countenances: and, as nothing is so prolific as lies, they “proceed from evil to evil;” wander more and more from God and truth; and employ all their ingenuity, industry, and even intrepidity, in venturing upon daring schemes of deception. So that there is need for every one to “take heed of his neighbour,” and to be cautious how he trusts even the nearest relation; lest he should be supplanted and circumvented. But whilst men thus lie in wait for their neighbours, Satan takes their souls in his snare, and “God sends them strong delusions:” the state of their hearts indisposes them for true religion: if they pretend to any, they are mere hypocrites; “not liking to retain “God in their knowledge,” they are left to some foolish scheme of superstition, enthusiasm, or scepticism; and so become perhaps the instruments of the devil, in propagating and strenuously contending for lies, instead of being “valiant for the truth upon the earth.” But, however corrupt any part of the visible church may become, or however God may visit and avenge himself on guilty nations, who are called by his name, he will always have a people upon earth. And he will either utterly cast off professing churches, which become thus corrupt; or he will melt and try them; and, putting away numbers as dross, he will bring forth a few as “vessels of honour,” fitted for his use.

V. 10—26.

When the judgments of God are abroad in the earth, those who are indeed wise, and understand such matters, and have heard and believed his word, will perceive for what reason he causes these calamities. And surely it behoves the Jews, who have been so long scattered among the nations, and consumed by a succession of calamities, to enquire, “wherefore the LORD hath thus fed them with “wormwood, and given them water of gall to drink.” Must it not be obvious, that it is because they have “forsaken his law, and not obeyed his voice; but followed “their own imaginations” and stubbornness, and the traditions of their fathers, in contempt of the Messiah, “the “Prince of peace, and the King of Israel?—It avails little to multiply expressions of sorrow, or to excite each other to lamentation, when death enters our houses, or desolates our streets; except we obey the word of the Lord, and mourn with “that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation, not to be repented of.” This, and this alone, can prepare the heart for true comfort, and convert the heaviest afflictions into the most precious mercies.—But, in this world of sin and sorrow, terminating speedily in death, and future judgment; how unreasonable is it for men to glory in learning, knowledge, sagacity, health, strength, authority, wealth, or any other appendage, which leaves them under the dominion of sin and the wrath of God! which cannot avert temporal or eternal misery! which may be torn from them in a moment, and of which an account must hereafter be given! which instead of rendering them happy, may probably increase their eternal condemnation! Happy is he, who knows God, by true faith in his word, and the experience of his mercy and grace in Jesus Christ; who beholds his glory, and is changed into his image; who is a follower of him in his “loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness;” and who delights in those things in which God delights! This is the true “circumcision of the heart, the praise of which is not of “men but of God.” Such men are the true Israel, “who “worship God in the Spirit, glory in Christ Jesus, and “have no confidence in the flesh.” Let us then prize this distinction, which is divine and eternal. Let us seek for it diligently, and then rejoice and glory in it above all other things: let us so value ourselves upon it, as to be above grovelling pursuits, and deem ourselves set apart for the glory of God our Saviour; and to him let us devote all our possessions and endowments, that he may be honoured in our use of them.—But the time is coming, when the uncircumcised in heart, and those who know no other than baptismal regeneration, will, notwithstanding their external forms and notions, along with the heathens and infidels, be “punished with an everlasting destruction from the “presence of the Lord.”

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. This is addressed, in general, to the house of Israel. The nation, when in their own land, had always been disposed to learn the idolatries and superstitions of their neighbours: the ten tribes were already dispersed in heathen countries, and the Jews were about to be carried captive to Babylon, the very centre and metropolis of idolatry. The gentiles in general, and the Chaldeans above all others, were addicted to astrology and omens; they were dismayed by comets, eclipses, and other unusual appearances of the heavenly bodies; and their determinations in the most important matters were often formed from these “signs of the heavens,” rather than from sound policy. This was the effect of ignorance concerning God, of idolatrous regard to his creatures, and of vain endeavours to pry into futurity; and therefore JEHOVAH’s worshippers must not imitate their customs. Whatever might seem to be portended by the signs of the heavens, they would be safe while trusting in God and walking in the path of duty; and nothing could truly presage prosperity to them, in the way of disobedience. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Is. xlvii. 12—15. Dan. ii. 2.)

V. 3—5. The prophet exposes the folly and stupidity of idolaters, in the same manner as Isaiah had before done. (Notes, Is. xli. 5—7. 21—24. xlv. 9—20. xlv. 1—9.)—Upright, &c. (5) “They are made with due proportion like a pillar.” The word Tamar is rendered pillar, ... Cant. iii. 6. Joel ii. 30. Lowth.

V. 6—8. The prophet here contrasts the glory of Israel’s God with the impotency of senseless idols, in an act of solemn worship addressed to him; that by interweaving adorations with his instructions, the people might be led to concur in this holy service. None of the imaginary deities, which some professed to worship under the form of their images, could be equalled to JEHOVAH: they were either inanimate creatures, or the departed spirits of eminent men, or ideal characters, or devils. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 17. 1 Cor. viii. 4—6. x. 18—22.) Nor could any of the wise legislators, philosophers, or rulers of the nations vie with the Lord, “the King of nations.” The word is the same, before rendered “heathen.” (2. Marg. Ref.) Who then would refuse to fear and worship him; whose infinite perfection, and absolute, universal, and everlasting sovereignty over all creatures, which are the works of his hands and wholly dependent on him; and whose power to save and to destroy, entitle him to this honour, and make it reasonable and advantageous to all rational creatures? Idolaters therefore must be altogether brutish and foolish; and the worship of a senseless block of wood, (however carved, or ornamented, or whatever it was supposed to represent,) must lead to the most unworthy apprehensions of God, to the most gross and pernicious mistakes, and to all vain and abominable practices. (10. Notes, v. 20—25. Ps. cxv. 3—8. Hab. ii. 18—20. Rev. xv. 1—4, v. 4.)

The stock, &c. (8) “The very wood itself being a ‘rebuker of vanities.’ ... מוֹכֵחַ properly signifies rectifying, or correcting a false notion by just reproof; and by vanities are meant idols. ... This unprofitableness of the idol, the very dull and senseless matter, says the prophet, out of which it is formed, is capable of demonstrating.” Blayney.

V. 9, 10. Some think that Uphaz is the same as Ophir: but this is quite uncertain. (Dan. x. 5.)—The contrast is very expressive and instructive between the most expensive and most richly ornamented dead images, and “the living and true God, the everlasting King, or King of

They (the idols,) are "indebted to the art and labour of man, for all their costly ornaments, their splendid outward shew. ... Upon what ground then could the thing formed pretend to a nature more excellent than its former!" Blayney.—Where, but in the Scriptures, do we meet with such sublime and rational thoughts concerning the great Creator and Lord of all? The very circumstance that the Bible, (and the Bible alone,) has established the doctrine of one God of infinite perfection, to the exclusion of all others, who have been or are called God, or have been or are worshipped; is a very convincing argument to a considerate mind, that it is the word of that One living and true God himself. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 11.)

V. 11. This verse, in the original, is in the Chaldee, and not in the Hebrew language; and it seems to have been thus previously inserted, that the captive Jews might have an answer ready for the idolaters, in their own language, when they tempted them to join in their worship. The idols were no gods; they had not created the world, and they would shortly be destroyed from the earth. This is an express prediction of the total extirpation of idolatry, which has already received a most wonderful accomplishment; and will be perfectly fulfilled, when that ambitious spirit, whom all idolaters worship, shall be confined in the bottomless pit. (Note, Rev. xx. 1-3.)—"Lest they should think they had acquitted themselves well, if they abstained from what they should see the heathen do; he tells them, they must do yet more than this: they must make open profession against their gods; they must proclaim against their idolatry: ... and therefore in the middle of his exhortation, he interlaceth these words in the Chaldee tongue. ... Can every friar in a pulpit ... warrant his words from being mistaken or perverted to heresy? And are the words ... of God so obnoxious that they may not be read? Nay, if God himself may not speak in a vulgar tongue, I see far less reason why a friar should. ... Ye have heard the state of the times, wherein this prophecy is commanded; now let us consider of the event. ... We have heard ... of the admired oracles of the gentiles, of Apollo at Delphos, of Jupiter Ammon in Egypt: ... but all of 'them are long since perished "from the earth, and from "under these heavens." We have heard of the names 'of many gods in former times of great renown in these 'islands of the gentiles; Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, &c. ... yet 'now are they perished. Where is now Bel, the god of 'Babylon, Nisroch the god of Assyria, Baal and Aseroth 'the gods of the Zidonians, ... Milcom of the Ammonites, Chemosh of Moab, and Tammuz of the Egyptians? 'Even these also are perished with their very names.' Mede's Sermon on this text. (Notes, Zeph. ii. 11. Zech. viii. 20-23. xiii. 2, 3.)—The fulfilment proves the words genuine and divine; though Blayney unreasonably supposes this important verse to be an interpolation.

V. 12, 13. (Note, li. 15-19.) Here again, the almighty and all-wise Creator and Upholder of the universe is contrasted with the senseless idols, in a manner exquisitely suited to shame the idolaters. The great Disposer of all events, "giveth rain from heaven and fruitful seasons;" and often accompanies the rain with tremendous thunder and lightning; and with hurricanes, which, while they produce terrible effects at the time, greatly tend to purify the atmosphere, and to render the air salubrious. Thus he orders the whole in judgment and mercy. (Notes, xiv. 19-22, v. 22. Job xxxvii. 1-13. xxxviii. 31-41, vv. 34-37. Ps. cxxxv. 7. Zech. x. 1.)

V. 14, 15. (Marg.) 'The more any man thinketh to 'do any thing well by his own wisdom, and not as God 'instructeth him, the more doth he prove himself to be 'a vile beast.' (Notes, 3-8.)—"The time of their visitation" means, the time appointed by the only wise God for punishing the idolaters, and pouring contempt on the idols. (Notes, 11. Zech. xiii. 2, 3.)

V. 16. (Notes, Ps. lxxxix. 6-12. Is. xl. 18-26.) Jehovah himself was Jacob's Portion; and he was not at all like the worthless idols, which were the portion of the heathen: for he is the Former, or Creator, of all things, and existed before all things, and from eternity. His infinite sufficiency is the riches of his chosen people; his wisdom chooses, and his power effects, their felicity; his truth engages to them, and his bounty bestows upon them, whatever can conduce to their good; and he is their great Protector; "the LORD of hosts," or armies, "is his name."—The nation of Israel typified this people of God; and as far as they lived up to their privileges, they possessed this happiness, and needed not to seek help from idols. In his disposal of the nations, JEHOVAH had taken them as his inheritance: his worship was established among them, his revenue of honour, from fallen man, was chiefly collected from them, and his peculiar delight was in them; while other nations were left to the worship and service of Satan. (Notes, Ex. xix. 5, 6. Deut. xxxii. 9. Mal. iii. 13—18. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)

22 Behold, ^hthe noise of the bruit is come, and a great commotion out of the north country, to make the cities of Judah desolate, and ⁱa den of dragons.

The rod of his inheritance.] ‘He had made choice of Israel for the special object of his concern; and had marked him out for his own possession, as with a measuring rod.’ Blayney.

V. 17, 18. Here the siege and destruction of Jerusalem are again predicted. Her inhabitants are called on to collect their treasures from the country, within the walls of the capital; yet this would not secure either themselves or their property: or rather to collect their moveables, as those who were about to change their abode; for they would at once and altogether be violently driven out of the land (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 23—31, v. 29. Ez. xii. 1—16:) and the Lord would make them feel the bitter effects of their sins, and the truth of his despised predictions, in their deep distress.

V. 19—22. The prophet here sympathizes with his country, and bewails its calamities; personating Judah, or Jerusalem.—The wound which had been inflicted was indeed very grievous, and greatly to be deplored: but it was unavoidable, and must be patiently endured, being the righteous appointment of God. ‘Thus he sheweth the people how to behave themselves.’—The city and temple were plundered and destroyed, like the removal of a tent: the children of his people were slain, or carried captive; so that none remained to rebuild their ruins. For the pastors (both rulers and teachers,) were become brutish in their conduct, neglecting every duty to God and man; (Note, Ps. xcii. 6, 7;) and thus they had occasioned the flock to be scattered, and the cities of Judah to be turned into a desert, where dragons or serpents abide.—The clause, “they shall not prosper,” is rendered in the old translation, “they have none understanding:” as they would not seek the Lord, they were judicially infatuated. (Notes, iv. 5—7. v. 30, 31. xxiii. 9—12. Is. lvi. 9—12. Ez. xxii. 25—28. xxxiv. 2—6.)—“The noise of the bruit,” (22) (an obsolete word signifying a report), means an alarming rumour, circulated in a loud and earnest manner, that the Chaldeans had entered the northern part of the land, and were marching directly to Judea. (Marg. Ref. h.)

V. 23—25. By thus addressing God, the prophet taught the people in what light to view their calamities, and how to pray respecting them.—‘He speaketh this, because that Nebuchadnezzar purposed to have made war against the Moabites and Ammonites; but hearing of Zedekiah’s rebellion he turned his power against Jerusalem.’ (Note, Ez. xxi. 19—22.)—In this enterprize he had been guided and prospered by God himself, who employed him to punish his rebellious people; “howbeit he meant not so.”—The hand of the Lord must therefore be acknowledged, and his justice submitted to, in these afflictive dispensations.—In like manner, the counsels and devices of the people would not accomplish their own purposes, but the decrees of God; nor would they ever be led back into the right way, by their own natural willingness, wisdom, or strength and therefore the case must be referred to the Lord, with prayer that he would guide and set them right. (Notes, Ps. xxxvii. 23, 24. Prov. xix. 21. xx. 24.)—The prophet next deprecates from his people that anger of God, which would utterly destroy them; (Marg. and Marg. Ref. l, m; and prays that their corrections might be so moderated, by his fatherly wisdom and love, that they might work together for good, (Notes, xxx. 10, 11. xli. 27, 28. Hab. ii. 2;) and that his vindictive fury might be averted from Israel, and poured out upon the idolatrous nations, especially such as had devoured and desolated Jacob his people. (Gen. x. 32. Notes, i. 15. Ps. lxxix. 6, 7.)—The last clause is literally, “They have eaten Jacob, yea, they have eaten him and consumed him, &c.”—Bring me to nothing (24) “Diminish me.” Marg. “Crush me atoms.” Blayney.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16

Man's apostasy from God has made way for his being deluded and enslaved by Satan to such a degree, as to be capable of the greatest absurdities under the notion of religion! and these soon become the customs of whole nations, who join together in worshipping a lifeless block, which cannot possibly do them either good or harm! Nothing, but revelation, has prevented this degrading folly and impiety from becoming universal: this appears, not only from the very general prevalence of idolatry; but from the strange propensity, which the worshippers of God have ever shewn to learn the ways of the heathen, and to turn aside to pagan idolatries and superstitions. Even in those Christian countries, where images and other vain pageantries no longer disgrace the worship; the regard paid by multitudes to the signs of the heavens, to charms, to astrological predictions in almanacks, and elsewhere; to lucky days, lucky numbers, good or bad omens, and things of a like nature; and all that fear of some unknown invisible power, which, in one way or other, is supposed to act independently of God, strangely prevails; and is evidently copied from the vain customs of the heathen, but is far more criminal in professed Christians than in them. But those who do not fear God, are always liable to be dismayed without cause: while such as reverence his majesty, dread his anger, seek his favour, worship his name, and walk in his ways, need not fear either the powers on earth, or the powers of hell. For there is "none like unto JEHOVAH, who is great in might, the King of nations," and "the Lord of all." To him all worship and honour appertain; and all, who are not foolish and brutish, will fear and serve him: for he is the true, living, and eternal God; and his wrath not only makes the earth to tremble, and overwhelms the nations, but "he is able to destroy body and soul in hell." Let sinners then forsake the company of his enemies, and join that of his reconciled people. He has a right to our devoted service as our great Creator: his wisdom contrived the glorious fabric of the universe, his power completed the grand design; in his knowledge and discretion he has established it hitherto. His command continues the course of the seasons, and the variations of the weather; the tremendous voice of his thunder, and the lightnings which attend his fertilizing rain, and the tempestuous winds which he "bringeth out of his treasures," shew him to be the Author of all our mercies, and warn us not to abuse them, nor to forget the Giver. But though we all have, for our rebellion and ingratitude, deserved his indignation; yet he is ready to forgive and save all, who repent and "believe "in the name of his Son Jesus Christ;" and thus sinners become a part of his valued inheritance, and he becomes their unchangeable Friend and all-sufficient Portion. These blessed truths faith learns from the word of God; but all other sources of instruction lead to doctrines of vanity: and all idols and impenitent idolaters, of every kind, will perish in the time of God's visitation.

V. 17—25.

We are continually warned to beware of resting in mere profession, and external forms and advantages. No place is so sacred, or so fortified, as to secure the workers of iniquity: and those who do not believe that God will execute his awful threatenings, will "find it so," when their wound will be far more grievous than they can now conceive. A gracious resignation indeed will support the believer under every grief, which the Lord may allot him: but what can render the load of divine and eternal vengeance tolerable to those, who fall under it in sullen despair? Alas! that the pastors of God's church should very often become so brutish, as to be given up to the pursuit of worldly interests and pleasures, to the neglect of him and his service! Such men cannot prosper, and their misconduct not only scatters their flocks, but brings down divine judgments on guilty nations.—But "the way of man is not in himself:" if the Lord has directed our steps into the ways of peace and righteousness; let us continually intreat him to enable us still to walk in them, and to "hold up our goings that we slip not:" and let us lift up our prayer for others, that they may be guided and directed in the same path.—If even severe corrections lead sinners to a conviction of these salutary truths, they will have abundant cause for gratitude: they will then humble themselves before God, and seek his guidance and assistance; they will submit to his correcting rod, and only deprecate the destroying sword of his avenging justice; and they will no longer remain under the condemnation of those nations, families, or individuals, "who call not upon the name of the Lord." But whilst he visits the offences of his people with sharp corrections, and destroys hypocrites; his hot displeasure will be poured out on those who have not known and worshipped him, and especially on the persecutors of his chosen people.

CHAP. XI. V. 2—8. The directions to the prophet are here given in the plural number, "Hear ye, &c." to Jeremiah as one of many, who had been charged with the same message: and they refer to the national covenant made with Israel at mount Sinai; and renewed just before the people took possession of the promised land. But idolatry and apostasy from God, when general; and when committed or connived at by publick authority, forfeited the covenant. The prophet was therefore sent to remind the people of the curses denounced in the law against the rebellious; and to shew, that the continuance of the benefits covenanted to them, when they were delivered from Egyptian bondage, depended on their obedience. (Note, vii. 21—23.) Whilst the Lord charged him with this message, and mentioned the good land given them, Jeremiah answered and said, "Amen, So be it, O LORD;" as expressing his acquiescence in this reasonable requirement, and the justice of the punishment denounced against the disobedient; (Notes, xxviii. 6, 7. Deut. xxvii. 15—26;) and also his hearty desire, that the people might return to obedience, and be continued in the possession of their privileges. He was then ordered to proclaim the covenant very publicly and extensively, in the cities of Judah, as well as in the streets of Jerusalem; to shew the people how their fathers had broken it; to predict the speedy approach of the calamities threatened in it; and to charge the whole nation with having conspired together to forsake God, and give themselves up to idolatry.—Some think that the prophet also reminded the people of the re-

He had espoused the nation by the Sinai-covenant; and they vainly deemed themselves his favourite people, and still came to his temple. But what had the spouse to do in the house of her husband, after all her shameless adulteries? She was now about to be divorced and turned out of doors. The Jews would soon be driven from the city and temple; the holy flesh of their sacrifices, which was burned upon the altar, or feasted on in the courts of the Lord, would cease from among them: (Note, Hag. ii. 10—14.) for God abhorred their oblations, seeing they rejoiced in iniquity.

When thou doest evil, &c.] Or, “When thou art wicked, shalt thou rejoice?” The LXX and vulgar Latin give a more easy sense of this verse; “Why hath my beloved committed lewdness in my house? Can vows, or the holy flesh take away thine iniquities from thee?” Lowth. They probably read הַקִּדְשִׁים instead of הַקִּדְשִׁים.

V. 16. (Notes, Rom. xi. 16—24.) The Lord had planted Israel in Canaan, as a good olive-tree in a rich soil; he had made the nation very prosperous, and afforded them every advantage for fruitfulness. (Notes, ii. 20, 21. Is. v. 1—7.) Once they were fruitful; and he called the nation “a green olive-tree, fair and of goodly fruit.” But they were now so degenerated, that he was determined to consume them, as with fire, by means of the tumultuous and furious Chaldean invaders. (Notes, Ez. xv. Matt. iii. 7—10.)

V. 17. (Marg. Ref.) Against themselves.] The evils which both Israel and Judah had done, in sinning against God, proved eventually to be committed “against themselves;” as the self-murderer destroys himself, soul and body, by breaking God’s commandment. (Notes, vii. 19. Prov. viii. 36.)

V. 18—23. Whilst the prophet was earnestly seeking the good of his people, a conspiracy was formed against his life. His brethren the priests, and the other inhabitants of his own city Anathoth, were the ringleaders in this combination. They could not endure his faithful warnings and reproofs: they hated “the man and his communications,” and were determined either to silence or to slay him; to “destroy the tree and its fruit,” (“the tree in its nutriment,” Blayney,) that he and his predictions might be forgotten together. But, before they had brought their matters to bear; the Lord discovered their devices to his prophet, and probably directed him how to frustrate them. Upon this he spake, as one in amazement: he had done nothing to merit this treatment from them; and had never suspected them, any more than the lamb, or ox, suspects danger when led to the slaughter. (Note, Prov. vii. 6—23, v. 22.) He then appeals for his innocence to God, who knows what passes in the inmost recesses of the heart; and refers his cause to him: and then, in the name of the Lord, denounces vengeance on his persecutors, root

CHAP. XII.

The prophet pleads with God concerning the prosperity of the wicked; appeals to him for his integrity; and prays that they, for whose sins the land was visited, might be selected for punishment, 1—4. God reproves his impatience, warns him to expect heavier trials, describes the wickedness of the people, and denounces sentence against them, 5—13. A prophecy of heavy judgments on the oppressors of the Jews, who would be restored to their own land: and of the calling of the Gentiles; the privileges of the obedient, and the destruction of the disobedient, 14—17.

and branch; so that no remnant should be left of them in the approaching season of visitation. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xii. 5, 6. xv. 10—21. xviii. 18—23. xx. 10—18.)—The words rendered, “Let me see thy vengeance on ‘them,’” are literally, “I shall see thy vengeance on them.” (Notes, Ps. liv. 7. lix. 10. xcii. 11.) ‘I foresee it and predict it: so that they will ruin themselves in seeking my ruin.’—This is one out of many instances, in which, I apprehend, an undue regard to the Septuagint has induced our venerable translators, needlessly to introduce the sacred writers, as uttering imprecations, rather than predictions, against their persecutors. It cannot be denied that these predictions sometimes must be rendered as imprecations; but this should not be done, when the words may literally be otherwise translated.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

Not only did the covenant of works, and Israel’s national covenant, denounce curses on those who obeyed not; (Note, Ex. xix. 5;) but the very Gospel threatens even severer vengeance on those who refuse obedience to the divine Redeemer: so that no man can be saved, who does not obey the command of God to repent, to believe in Christ, to separate from sin and the world, to deny himself, and to “walk in newness of life.” Indeed it is absurd to suppose, that a God of unchangeable holiness should, under any dispensation, authorize rebellion and ingratitude. Still he earnestly protests to all men, saying, “Obey my voice;” and commands his ministers most publicly to make known his words; and especially to charge “all that name the name of Christ to depart from iniquity.” But alas! how few do thus obey! In general men cry, “Lord, Lord, but do not the things which he says.” They hearken to his ministers, whilst they speak of doctrines, promises, and privileges: but when self-denying duties are mentioned, they will not “incline their ear, but “walk every man in the imagination of his evil heart.” And professed Christians in general seem to have conspired together to run down strict holy walking with God; to return back to the iniquities of their heathen ancestors; and to copy after those, who have refused to hear the commandments of God! But the law is not written in the hearts of such men; and it is certain, that the new covenant is not ratified with them; their sins are not forgiven; and the curses of the Bible belong to them, and nothing else. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34.) Evil is coming upon them, which they cannot escape: if they now remain impenitent, their extorted cries for mercy will at last be disregarded; and they will be left to seek help from their idolized lusts and possessions: their shameful practices will be exposed; and they will find, that even the prayers of despised ministers for their conversion, having returned into their own bosom, will only aggravate their condemnation.—They may glory in their relation to God, as his “beloved,” and presume that all the privileges of his covenant are their own: but whilst they “rejoice in “iniquity,” they profane his ordinances here, and have nothing to do in his holy habitation in heaven. For when the olive-trees and fig-trees, that have been planted in this vineyard, remain unfruitful; though they be luxuriant in foliage and of promising appearance, yet they shall surely be cut down, and cast into the fire. (Note, Luke xiii. 6—9.)

V. 18—23.

Those who venture to address presumptuous professors of religion, after the manner in which Jeremiah addressed the Jews, must expect to be hated for their faithfulness; how much soever they weep over them, and pray for them, or spend themselves in labouring for their good. Though they be harmless and gentle as the lamb, and patient and laborious as the ox, and devoid of guile and suspicion, they will be persecuted, instead “of highly esteemed, for their works’ sake:” for such men as crucified the holy Lamb of God, will always abhor those who rebuke and warn them as he did: and they would put them to death also, if they had it in their power, and if they could not otherwise silence them. For they want to destroy their reprovers, that they may no more remember or be tormented by their faithful testimony. (Notes, Matt. v. 10—12. Rev. xi. 7—12.) But the Lord knows his servants, and can protect them against all the devices of persecutors: and he will certainly plead their cause, and execute vengeance on their enemies.—In every age of the church, ungodly priests have been ringleaders in this diabolical work; “a man’s foes are often those of his own household;” and a prophet will be sure to be most without honour in his own country. (Note, Matt. xiii. 54—58.)—When the Lord, by any means, discovers to us the enmity and devices of our opposers; we shall find it a peculiar comfort to be able to appeal to him, as the heart-searching and righteous Judge, that we suffer for well doing, and not for evil-doing: (Notes, 1 Pet. iii. 17, 18. iv. 12—16:) and we should reveal our cause, and refer the whole matter to him. We should, however, also look well to our spirits that we “be not overcome with evil;” but that, by patient continuance in praying for our enemies, and shewing them kindness, we may, if possible, “overcome evil with good.” (Note, Rom. xii. 17—21.)

phet's discomposure, on account of the conspiracy formed against him, led him into a perplexity about the prosperity of the workers of iniquity, among whom he numbered the men of Anathoth as the principal. He also thought that judgments inflicted on the ringleaders might prevent the ruin of the nation; and he resolved to pour out his heart before God on this subject. He assumed it as certain, that the Lord was righteous in his most mysterious dispensations: yet he intreated him, to allow him to "expostulate with him of judgments;" (i. 16. iv. 12. Heb.) and to shew him the reasons of his conduct; and why he suffered such treacherous men, as cloked their inward iniquitous devices with a profession of piety, to prosper in their families, circumstances, and undertakings. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 3, 4. Job xii. 6—10. xxi. 7—16. Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2. lxxiii.) He could with confidence appeal to the heart-searching God, that he acted uprightly; and that he was hated and persecuted for his sake: and he therefore prayed that these principal transgressors might be singled out for punishment, as sheep are for the slaughter; that a check being thus given to the growth of wickedness, and a sacrifice as it were made to divine justice, the drought under which the land laboured might be terminated. (Note, xiv. 2—6.)—These presumptuous criminals had said, that the prophet "should not see their last end:" that is, they were confident that the judgments which he predicted would not be executed: and they had determined to compass his death, and thus prevent him from seeing whether they would or not.—'God will never bring that destruction upon us, with which Jeremiah threatens us.' Lowth. (Notes, Ps. xciv. 1—9.)—Near, &c. (2) Notes, Is. xxix. 13—16. Matt. xv. 7—9.

V. 5, 6. The Lord seems here gently to reprove the prophet's impatience. The opposition of the men of Anathoth was not so formidable, as what he must expect to encounter from the kings and rulers of Judah; and the present calamities of the nation were trivial, compared with the approaching desolations. If then he was so disconcerted by these lighter trials, how would he endure more severe afflictions? If he was so wearied with running with footmen, or contending with his equals; how would he be disquieted, when required to run with horsemen, or execute his office in defiance of those in authority? (Notes, xxvi. xxxvi. xxxvii. xxxviii.) If he could scarcely endure, when the land, (in which he too confidently had expected safety,) remained in peace; what would he do, when hostile invasions would bear down all before them, like the overflowing waters of Jordan? (Notes, xlix. 19, 20. Josh. iii. 15.) And as his nearest relations, even such as were nearer to him, than the rest of the men of Anathoth, and whom he probably supposed to be unconcerned in the conspiracy, would fiercely combine against him, and excite the multitude to assault him; so he must expect opposition from every quarter, and prepare for it; and he ought not to trust even those who spake most friendly to him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Mic. vii. 5—7. Matt. x. 34—36.)

V. 7—9. The Lord next condescended to explain his purposes concerning the Jews, and the reasons of his conduct, to his discouraged servant. He was determined to forsake his temple, and to give up his heritage, (which he had so long treated with peculiar kindness,) into the hands of his enemies. (Notes, x. 16. xi. 15.) For his people were become outrageous and rapacious as lions; they openly quarrelled with his appointments and requirements; and because they could not reach him, they shewed their enmity by murdering his prophets. This was the general character of the nation, and therefore the Lord abhorred them. Nay, they were become as a speckled bird: they had collected together all the abominations of the surrounding countries; and combined them, together with the worship of JEHOVAH, in to one motley mixture of idolatry and superstition. Therefore the nations should be let loose against them, to punish them for borrowing their idolatries; and as birds of prey, or wild beasts to devour them. (*Marg.

Ref. z.*)—The word, rendered “speckled,” is of uncertain signification; occurring only in this place. It is derived from a root, which signifies to colour, or, to paint in a variegated manner. A bird seems evidently meant, by the context. The margin renders it “having talons.”

V. 10—13. (Notes, vi. 2, 3. Is. v. 1—7.) The captains of Nebuchadnezzar’s army were the many pastors here intended; they came, as shepherds with their flocks, to devour and tread down Judah and Jerusalem; (the Lord’s vineyard, the hedge of which he had broken down:)
and when this pleasant portion should be desolated, it would mourn unto him; the very ruins of the city and temple would, as it were, mournfully cry for redress; and the captive Jews would repent of their sins, and seek deliverance. But till these judgments were actually inflicted, none of the people would lay either the denunciations, or any preceding corrections, to heart. (Note, Is. xlii. 22—25.) The Chaldean spoilers therefore would come through the wilderness, to destroy Jerusalem, and all their fortified places; for the Lord would use them as his sword to destroy the whole land, and to take away peace from every inhabitant: all the methods, which could be taken for relief, though laborious and expensive, would resemble the sowing of wheat and the reaping of thorns or thistles: and they would be ashamed, when they saw the wretched effects of all their devices and efforts. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, xlvii.
6, 7. Ez. xiv. 13—21.)

V. 14—17. The Jews had deserved their calamities from God: but the neighbouring nations injuriously invaded and spoiled them, out of hatred to JEHOVAH and his worship; and because they coveted the land which he had allotted his people: and therefore he would plead their cause against his evil neighbours; and both execute judgments on them, and re-instate Judah in his own land.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, xxv. xlviii—li. Ez. xxv. xxvi.
2. Am. i. 11, 12. Ob. 10—16.)—Yet he would afterwards shew mercy to those nations, and give them the quiet possession of the countries, which he had assigned them: nay, he meant to admit them into his church, and to all the privileges of his people; when they were disposed to learn his true religion, as they had formerly taught the Israelites their idolatries. This evidently implies a prediction of the incorporation of the Jews and Gentiles in the Christian church; (Notes, Eph. ii. 11—23;) and looks forward to those times, when all Israel shall be restored, and “the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in;”
and when all nations will be destroyed, which persist in their opposition to the cause of Christ. (Notes, Is. lx. 10—14. Zech. x. 5—12. xiv. 12—21. Rev. xix. 11—21.)— “Those that will not have God and Christ to reign over them, shall in the end be punished with everlasting destruction.” Lowth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The Lord allows his people to spread their perplexities before him, and humbly to plead with him concerning his judgments: but he expects it to be always taken for granted, that “he is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.”—The success and prosperity of the wicked, and especially that of persecutors and deceivers, who oppose the cause of God; terrify or seduce multitudes into impiety, infidelity, or hypocrisy; and bring down judgments on churches and nations, is very embarrassing to the pious mind. Yet the Lord never permits such men to prosper; except it be for the salutary trial or correction of his people; or for just judgments on those who hate

CHAP. XIII.

The prophet, by the sign of a linen girdle, first worn by him, and then buried and spoiled near Euphrates, and by the simile of bottles filled with wine, predicts the approaching captivity, and the miseries attending it, 1—14. He calls the king, the rulers, and the people to repentance; and mourns over their pride, and in the prospect of their calamities, 15—21. He expostulates with them, concerning their incorrigible obstinacy, 22—27.

THUS saith the LORD unto me, ^aGo and get thee a linen girdle, and put it upon thy loins, and put it not in water.

^bSo I got a girdle, ^baccording to the word of the LORD, and put it on my loins.

3 And the word of the LORD came unto me the second time, saying,

4 Take the girdle that thou hast got, which is upon thy loins; and arise, ^cgo to Euphrates, and hide it there in a hole of the rock.

5 So I went, and hid it by Euphrates ^das the LORD commanded me.

6 And it came to pass after many days, that the LORD said unto me, ^eArise, go to Euphrates, and take the girdle from thence, which I commanded thee to hide there.

7 Then I went to Euphrates, and digged, and took the girdle from the place where I had hid it; and, behold, the girdle was marred, ^fit was profitable for nothing.

his truths and precepts: and those who are spared to be executioners of wrath on others, and “to treasure up wrath for themselves,” should not be called happy. For if they be “planted, and take root, and bear fruit,” it is unto death and condemnation. It is not easy, however, in trying circumstances, to avoid every degree of impatience; even when the Lord himself may safely be appealed to for our integrity, and when the hypocrisy of our opponents is most evident. Our grief for the prevalence of iniquity is often leavened with peevishness, on account of the trials which it occasions us: and our zeal for the honour of God, our abhorrence of sin, and even our love to the church and nation to which we belong, are often mingled with an undue regard to our own credit, and bitterness against our opposers. We ought then on such occasions, to watch our hearts, and to bridle our tongues, that we may not speak or act unadvisedly, and in our own spirit.—Should the Lord see any of us, in this our favoured day, fretful or desponding under our trifling difficulties, he might sharply and properly reprove us, as he did his servant of old: we should therefore judge ourselves; and consider how we should behave, if, instead of our light trials, we were called to sufferings like those of the prophets, apostles, and martyrs of other ages or nations: thus our minds would be quieted in submission and gratitude. We ought not, however, to trust in our land of peace, for we know not what overwhelming calamities await us; and we are sure, that if we be indeed faithful in the cause of truth and holiness, the wicked, though nearly related, will hate us, and we must expect treachery cloaked with fair words: we should then prepare for trials, and count our cost; and we may well question our own faithfulness, if all go smoothly with us in this evil world. But none will be so inveterate against the faithful servant of God, as those who presume themselves to be his chief favourites, merely because they have enjoyed and perverted peculiar advantages. Such men count every privilege their own, by a title which nothing can forfeit: and as they are ready to complain of the Lord, when he thwarts them in providence; so they are enraged at his ministers when they reprove them from his word. They often desire to be deemed the lambs of his fold; but their ungoverned tempers and rapacity shew them to be more like furious lions devouring the prey: and, instead of the purity and simplicity of the dove, they present to the view a heterogeneous mixture of religion and the world, with its vain fashions, maxims, pursuits, and pollutions. Thus many churches become like speckled birds, mixing together religion and vain superstition: attempting to serve God and Mammon, and to form a coalition between light and darkness, Christ and Belial. (Note, 2 Cor. vi. 14—18. P. O. 11—18.) But this the Lord abhors: and for such degeneracy he often leaves them to be punished by the very persons, whose vices and errors they have imitated.—All the efforts of sinners to escape misery, without repentance and “fruits meet for repentance,” will surely terminate in confusion; “because of the fierce anger of the LORD.” But if judgment begin at the house of God, let not the evil neighbours and persecutors of his church expect impunity. (Notes, 1 Pet. iv. 17—19.) Yet in wrath our God remembers mercy: he will assuredly return and compassionate his church; and all who diligently learn his ways, and join themselves to his spiritual worshippers, shall be built up among them, even though they once were tempters of others to the vilest abominations: but inevitable destruction awaits all that persevere in disobedience. May we then employ ourselves diligently in learning the ways of the Lord, and be thankful that poor gentiles may acceptably worship his name: let us endeavour in our several places, to lead others also to the knowledge of “the truth as it is in Jesus:” and may he speedily unite all Israel, and all the Gentiles, in “one fold under one Shepherd,” and “destroy every enemy which continues to do evil in his sanctuary.”

washing, ^z to represent the Jews in their corrupt state of nature, when they had nothing to recommend them to grace and favour. Comp. Ez. xvi. 4. Lowth. Perhaps the prophet was required to wear the girdle for a considerable time without washing, when it would cease to be ornamental, and even become offensive; as an emblem of the corrupt state of Israel, the chosen people of God (11).—Most interpreters conclude that the subsequent transaction was only a vision: but it is related as a fact; and it is not adviseable, without evident necessity, to sanction such a mode of interpretation, in opposition to the obvious meaning of scripture. (Note, xxv. 15-17.) Nay, the self-denying, laborious, implicit obedience of the prophet, in taking these journeys of several hundreds of miles each, might be intended, as well as aptly suited, to render his sign impressive; to shame the disobedience of the people, and to shew the excessive hardships, to which they would be exposed by the approaching captivity. (Note, Hos. i. 2, 3.)—Euphrates. (4) ^z To signify the Jews being carried captive over that river. Lowth.

V. 8-11. It is probable that the people were made acquainted with this sign, some time before it was expounded to them; and they were left to make their own observations on it: at length God instructed his servant to explain it. He had chosen Israel to be his covenanted people, and brought them near unto him by every external privilege, "that they might be unto him for a people, and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory:" "That they might have the honour of being called by my name; and I might be glorified, by their shewing forth my truth and praises to the world." Lowth. (Marg. Ref. n, o. —Notes, ii. 2, 3. xxxiii. 6-9. Gen. ii. 24. Ex. xix. 5, 6. Is. xliii. 14-21, v. 21. 1 Pet. ii. 8, 9.) And this was the case, whilst they adhered to his worship, and were obedient and prosperous. But they gloried in their peculiar distinctions, and were very proud of them, and at the same time turned aside to atrocious and obstinate idolatry and iniquity. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k-m, p.) Thus they became a disgrace instead of an honour to the Lord; losing their comeliness, and becoming polluted like the unwashed girdle. Therefore he purposed to punish them by the Chaldeans, and to carry the remnant of them captives to Babylon. Then their "great pride would be marred:" their temple would be destroyed, and its worship caused to cease; their city would be desolated, their prosperity ruined, their numbers reduced; and a poor, despised, enslaved company alone would be left to go captives to Babylon, and there to be worn out by oppressions, till they became like the decayed girdle. (Notes, Lam. v. 1-16.) Yet while this would "mar their great pride," it was not intended to ruin the nation, but to prepare them for future mercies. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)

V. 12-14. The prophet was next ordered, in the name of the Lord, to assure the people, that "every bottle should be filled with wine." This seems to have been a proverbial expression, and applied in different ways; and the Lord forewarned him, that they would reply, in a mixture of contempt and indignation, "Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" "The hearers shall take this prophecy in great scorn, and say, 'What wonders are these that thou tellest us? As if we knew not, that the use of bottles is to be filled with wine! Tell these things to children that understand nothing.' Bp. Hall.—Upon this he was ordered to explain his meaning; and to shew them, that as the bottle was fitted to hold the wine, so their sins had made them "vessels of wrath, fitted for" the judgments of God: and that they should all be filled with them, till they were intoxicated and made furious, to accomplish each other's destruction; like earthen bottles filled with wine and dashed against each other. V. 15—17. These denunciations seem to have greatly exasperated the Jews: but the prophet endeavoured to enforce his warnings, and soften their resentments, by a most pathetick exhortation. He intreated their patient and attentive hearing; for these were indeed the words of God, and not his own devices. Instead of proudly rejecting his message; he exhorted them to “give glory to God,” by confessing their sins, acknowledging his justice, humbling themselves in repentance, seeking forgiveness, and returning to his worship and service: (Note Josh. vii. 19:) and to do this without delay, that the threatened judgments might, if possible, be averted. Otherwise the Lord would speedily extinguish all their prosperity, and leave them in darkness and despondency: then they would be in distress, like that of men wandering in the dark upon the mountains, liable every moment to fall down precipices, or to be devoured by wild beasts. Or, they would be carried from the “valley of vision” into countries destitute of the light of Revelation, and enveloped in all the darkness of idolatry and wickedness: there they would be left to stumble and fall without remedy; all their hopes would terminate in disappointment and deeper distress, which would be introductory to the final misery and despair, of those who persisted in impenitence. (Notes, iv. 19—27. Is. v. 26—30. viii. 21, 22. lix. 9—15. Am. viii. 4—10, vv. 9, 10. John xii. 34—36.) But, if they would not hear his words, the prophet assured them, that, so far from rejoicing in the prospect of their miseries, he should weep secretly and bitterly, lamenting their pride and obstinacy, their presumption, and their contempt of the authority and defiance of the vengeance of God; which he knew would terminate in the captivity of the whole company of his oppressed people. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, 18—21. ix. 1, 2.)—The word rendered “dark,” seems to mean the break of day seen on the mountains. Various circumstances gave the Jews a sort of glimmering prospect of deliverance; appearing amid their dangers and calamities, as the dawn of day. But when they expected that this would increase, and usher in the clear light; God turned it into the very

V. 18—21. Some think that Jeconiah and his mother are here meant; and others that Jehoiakim and his queen were addressed. (Notes, xxii. 24—27. 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16, v. 15.)—The prophet seems to have charged the princes, who heard him, to repeat his words “to the king and queen;” requiring them in the name of God to sit down on the ground as penitents: (Is. iii. 26. xlvii. 1. Lam. ii. 10:) for all the authority, splendour, and decorations, of which they were proud, would soon be brought to nothing: the cities of Judah, even those of the south and so most distant from the enemy, would be besieged without being relieved, and the whole nation carried into captivity. Or, the cities of Egypt, to which the Jews hoped to retreat if driven to extremities, would be shut against them, and none would be able to open them. The invaders would be seen coming from the north: and the prosperous nation, which was also “the flock of God” (17), would be scattered, destroyed, or carried captive, through the wickedness of the king, princes, and people. And what would they say, when the king of Babylon should come to punish them for their crimes? For the house of David, and the people of Judah, had brought themselves into dependence on that prince, by their sinful propensity to call in the help of heathen allies, instead of confiding in the Lord: (Notes, 2 Kings xvi. 7—9. xviii. 14—16. xx. 12—18:) and now their sorrows on that account would become extreme and unavailing. (Marg. Ref.)

‘female, that is here addressed, must be the daughter of Judah, who is asked, with a sarcastical sneer, what was become of all the numerous multitudes, which God had given her formerly, constituting, like flocks of sheep, the national wealth and glory.’ Blayney. Our translation of these verses can hardly be supported; yet the variations proposed, and supported by grammatical criticisms, which cannot here be adduced, very little affect the meaning or the instruction of the passage.

V. 22. The Lord knew that the people would enquire, in their hearts at least, what they had done that such punishments should be inflicted on them. (Notes, ii. 22—24. 33—37. v. 19. xvi. 10—12.) To this thought he answered, that if their offences had not been very heinous, he would not have thus exposed them: but the greatness of their iniquity required, that he should strip them of all their ornaments, and leave them exposed to the contempt and scorn of their enemies; that he might shew his abhorrence of sin, especially in his professed worshippers. (26. Notes, Is. iii. 16, 17. xx. 2—4. xlvii. 1—3. Lam. i. 8—11, ov. 8, 9. Ez. xvi. 35—43, v. 37.)

V. 23. This proverbial expression is evidently adduced to aggravate the incorrigible obstinacy of the Jews, and to shew, that no ordinary means would be effectual for their reformation: it might as reasonably be expected, that an Ethiopian could be brought by argument to change the colour of his skin, and the leopard to divest himself of his spots; as that exhortations would induce the Jews to renounce those idolatries and iniquities, which they had been taught, (marg.) and to which they had been so long habituated.—It also holds good of man’s natural propensity to evil and aversion to good, from which nothing can convert him, except the power which could change the colour of the negro’s skin. But education in corrupt principles and wicked practices, strengthens natural depravity; and custom is second nature, which men voluntarily bring upon themselves, and which is doubly criminal and incorrigible. This was the general case of the Jews, and they were therefore to be cut off by desolating judgments: a remnant only being preserved, from whom a new race would spring, which had not contracted those habits of idolatry, that had so long been inveterate among their progenitors.—The word rendered “accustomed” is literally, instructed; not merely the effect of bad habits, but of false principles assiduously inculcated.—‘Bochart indeed main‘tains, that the word’ (Cush) ‘is never used for Ethiopia properly so called: but this text is a good proof to the contrary, and may, most probably, be understood of the Africans, or Blackmores, as they are commonly called. ... A moral change in habitual sinners is almost as impossible as a natural one. Thus our Saviour compares the difficulty of a rich man’s entering into the kingdom of God, to a natural impossibility: viz. to “a camel’s passing through the eye of a needle;” (Matt. xix. 24;) but yet qualifies the comparison by adding, “What is impossible with men is possible with God:” i. e. God’s grace can surmount such difficulties, as are impossible for nature to overcome: and thus we are to understand the text before us.’ Lowth. V. 27. The former part of this verse is properly, by the Septuagint, connected with the preceding. “That thy shame may appear; thy adulteries, thy neighings, and the lewdness of thy whoredoms. I have seen thine abominations, &c.”—The Jews were not only unable to cleanse themselves from their filthiness and idols; but they were not willing to be made clean, being in love with their abominations. As the Lord used all proper means for their being cleansed, and was ready to afford effectual assistance to those who sought it; their unwillingness was their only inability: for by his help, the Ethiopian might change his skin, and they might learn to do good. The Lord therefore here demands of Jerusalem, whether she was determined not to be made clean; and how long this was to be delayed, if she ever intended it. All her miseries arose from this not having been at any time the case with her. (Notes, ii. 22—24. iii. 2, 3. iv. 14. v. 7—9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

They, who are employed in the more important offices in the Lord’s service, will often be called to peculiar self-denial and hardship. It behoves us to render implicit obedience to all his commands, however laborious they may be, and though they should seem unreasonable to the carnal eye: and if we obey the will of God as far as we know it at present; he will give us further instructions, as they become needful.—Every means should be used, by which the minds of men may be made sensible of their ingratitude and rebellion against God, and awakened to a conviction of their guilt and danger: yet nothing will be effectual without the concurrent influences of the Holy Spirit.—The peculiar advantages, which the Lord confers on nations, favoured with his word and ordinances, are intended to render them his people; and that they may be to him “for a name, a praise, and a glory:” but no external relation will profit those, who refuse to hear his words; and who persist in “walking after the imaginations of their evil hearts:” and degenerate professors of religion are the most worthless, and shall be rendered the most contemptible, of all men.—When the gifts of God render men proud and presumptuous, they will either be torn from them, or increase their disgrace and misery: but whatever the Lord takes from us, or lays upon us; if he “mar the great pride” of our hearts, and bring us to self-abasement and true repentance, we shall have cause to be very thankful. (P. O. Dan. iv. 10—18.)—Every kind of sin shews men to be “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction;” but pride and impenitence continue them in that state.—When nations are ripened for destruction, all ranks of men may expect to be filled with the indignation of Almighty God; and when this is the case, they are often so given up to ambition, envy, suspicion, and revenge, as to destroy one another by civil wars and intestine discords; in which even parents and children engage in opposite parties, and destroy one another! When God is provoked to say, “I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them;” rage, misery, and desolation must be the dire effect.

V. 15—27.

The proud are not disposed to hear the warnings of God by his ministers: they do not believe that he has spoken by them, but ascribe their alarming words to melancholy or malevolence: and thus they disregard the friendly admonition, until it be too late. Yet, “whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear,” we must call on them “to give glory to God,” by repentance, faith, and conversion to him, whilst the day of his patience endures. The humiliation of individuals indeed may not prevent national judgments; but it will preserve the persons themselves from darkness and despair.—It is very dreadful when kingdoms are wasted, the inhabitants massacred or enslaved, and churches bereaved of the light of divine truth: but when God leaves men to be blinded, and to fall into error and delusion here, and into “the blackness of darkness for ever,” the judgment is far more tremendous: and who can tell how soon he may leave the obstinate unbeliever thus to stumble and fall; and, while he looks for light, to find it turned into the shadow of death, and made gross darkness?”—The true minister will be deeply affected at the pride of those who do not regard the word of God; he often laments in his closet, over such as he has offended by his awful warnings: and if sinners could witness the prayers offered for them, and the tears shed on their account, by some who “declare the whole counsel of God” to them, they could not but ascribe their plain-dealing to other causes than they now do.—All misery, witnessed or foreseen, will affect a feeling mind: but the pious heart is especially grieved at the afflictions of the Lord's flock.—As none are too great to be sinners, and to be accountable to God; and as whole nations and churches suffer through the folly and wickedness of princes; it should be said to them especially, ‘Humble yourselves before God, and penitently sue for his mercy, submit to his will, and seek his glory, and the honour which cometh from him.’ All other distinctions are a vain pageantry, which will soon be terminated by death, and are often taken away in this life: and as ministers must give an account of the people committed to their charge; so must kings and rulers, of the nations which they were entrusted to govern, and of the good or mischief which they did with their authority. But what will sinners say, when they shall be delivered up to be punished by that enemy, whom they have long allowed to rule over them? Will not sorrows then seize on them, as on a woman in travail?—It is natural for pride to object, Wherefore are we to be thus punished? But all such objections will be answered, when the Lord shall expose to the whole world the greatness of their iniquities.—It is a dreadful case when sinners become habituated to evil, even under the means of grace: their inability to good becomes the great aggravation of their guilt, and renders them obstinate and incorrigible in rebellion, and perfectly like Satan, the arch-apostate and rebel; and thus they are given over to final obduracy. Men should therefore be very careful not to contract habits of sin, and not to resist the convictions of their consciences.—Yet, though we cannot “change the Ethiopian's skin, or the leopard's spots,” our God can; and neither natural depravity, nor the strongest habits of iniquity, form any obstacle to the operations of his new-creating Spirit. We should therefore hope and endeavour to do good to those who are the most enslaved to inveterate habits of vice: uniting our efforts with constant and earnest prayers for a blessing on them. And if any poor slave of sin feels, that he could as soon change the course of nature, as conquer his headstrong lusts and inveterate habits, or learn to delight in doing good, let him not despair; “for the things that are impossible to man, are possible to God;” and he even now asks him, whether he will, or will not, “be made clean.” Let him then without delay call for help to him who is almighty to save, and who “waiteth to be gracious,” and he will say to him, “I will, be thou clean,” and so his leprosy shall be cleansed. But if men hesitate, and procrastinate, and will not use the appointed means of cleansing; misery and woe will be measured out to them

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV V. 1. Some think, that the events referred to in this chapter, occurred about the end of Josiah's reign: but it is more likely, that all these prophecies were delivered at a later period, and nearer to the final desolations of the land; at least, after the open prevalence of idolatry, which followed the death of Josiah. 'The He-brew Batzaroth' (rendered "dearth") 'signifies restraint'; that is, "when the heaven is shut up that there is no rain." '... Deut. xi. 17. 1 Kings viii. 35.' Lowth. (Marg.)

V. 2—6. Some render this passage, in the future, as a prediction: but the prophet seems to speak of scenes, which he himself witnessed.—But whether it be a narrative, or a prophecy; he has in these verses given a melancholy description of this calamity and its effects. Through the want of rain, and the consequent failure of the crops, the whole land of Judah mourned in deep distress. Those who went in and out, through the gates of the cities, languished for want of food; or the gates were unfrequented by those who had been used to bring in provisions. The people neglected their persons, and lay on the ground, squalid, meagre, and dejected, through want and misery: and the cry of Jerusalem went up; either their cries of distress, or their supplications for deliverance; for it is probable, that a day of fasting and humiliation was observed on the occasion. (Note, 10—12.) The very nobles were distressed for want of water, and sent their own children, as not caring to trust others in this emergency, to fetch it from the wells or cisterns; but none could be had: and they returned with empty vessels, ashamed, and covering their heads as mourners or penitents. (Marg. Ref. g.) The husbandman either could not plow the parched ground, or they cultivated it in vain: so that they were ashamed of their confidence in their industry and knowledge of agriculture; and found themselves unable to support their families, or sustain their own lives. (Notes, Joel i. 11. 17, 18.) The very beasts shared the distress: the hinds forsook their young, (as it is usual with some animals in such circumstances,) not having any milk for them, through want of food for themselves: and the wild asses gasped for breath, and looked like dragons, or large serpents, which in hot and dry seasons greedily inhale the cooling air on the mountains, or unsheltered plains: and their eyes, keen in themselves, grew dim through heat, hunger, and thirst. (Notes, Joel i. 17—20.)

The gates ... are black, &c. (2) "They are in deep mourning." By this passage we are to understand, that the persons who appear in publick are dejected, and put on black, or mourning, on account of the national distress. Blayney.—The ground is chapt. (4) "Is crumbled to dust." Ibid.

V. 7—9. In this extreme distress, the prophet ventured to intercede for his people, notwithstanding the interdiction which had been laid upon him: (Notes, vii. 16. xi. 14:) and he seems still to have indulged a hope, that by repentance the threatened judgments might be averted; or at least that this would be a lengthening of the tranquillity of Judah. He acknowledged that their multiplied apostasies, idolatries, and iniquities were so many witnesses against them, that they had deserved these miseries: but he intreated the Lord, for the honour of his own name, to interpose in their behalf. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 26, 27. Josh. vii. 6—9. Ps. lxxiv. 21—23. lxxix. 8—13. Ez. xx. 7—9. Eph. i. 3—8.) He had always been the only "Hope of Israel;" and their Deliverer, even from those troubles which had come upon them for their sins: and would he now finally forsake them? He had dwelt among them and taken care of them, as of his own habitation; and if he had left them for a time, to chastise them for their sins, he had soon returned to them in mercy: and would he now be as a stranger? or as a traveller, who, having tarried for a night in any place, departs next morning, and takes no more thought about it? He had shewed himself

10 Thus saith the LORD unto this people, Thus ^a have they loved to wander, they have not ^a refrained their feet; therefore ^b the LORD doth not accept them: ^c he will now remember their iniquity, and visit their sins.

11 Then said the LORD unto me, ^d Pray not for this people for their good.

12 When ^e they fast, I will not hear their cry; ^f and when they offer burnt-offerings and an oblation, I will not accept them: ^g but I will consume them by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence.

13 ¶ Then said I, ^h Ah, Lord God! behold the prophets say unto them, Ye shall not see the sword, neither shall ye have famine; but I will give you ⁱ assured peace in this place.

14 Then the LORD said unto me, The prophets prophesy lies in my name: ^j I sent them not, neither have I commanded them, neither spake unto them: they prophesy unto you a false vision and ^k divination, and a thing of nought, ^l and the deceit of their heart.

15 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the prophets that prophesy in my name, and I sent them not, yet they say, ⁿ Sword and famine shall not be in this land; By sword and famine shall those prophets be consumed.

16 And ^o the people, to whom they prophesy, shall ^p be cast out in the streets of Jerusalem, because of the famine and the sword; and they shall have none to bury them, them, their wives, nor their sons, nor their daughters: ^q for I will pour their wickedness upon them.

17 Therefore thou shalt say this word unto them; ^r Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day, and let them not cease: ^s for the virgin-daughter of my people is broken with a great breach, ^t with a very grievous blow.

18 If I ^u go forth into the field, then behold the slain with the sword! and if I enter into the city, then behold them that are sick with famine! ^v yea, both the prophet and the priest ^w go about into a land that they know not.

ready and able to save: and would he now appear like a man, who is surprised by some unexpected accident, which renders him unable to save those who expect help from his power and valour?—The gentiles would be ready to draw conclusions to this effect from the calamities of that people, by whom JEHOVAH had so long been worshipped, among whom he had his only temple, and who were called by his name, or, on whom “his name was called:” and therefore the prophet pleaded, that the honour of his power, wisdom, truth, and goodness engaged him not to leave his people to sink under their afflictions. (Notes, x. 23—25, v. 25. Is. lxiii. 15—19. lxiv. 1—3. 6—12.)

V. 10—12. God condescended to shew the prophet, that his “zeal,” in this case, “was not according to knowledge.” He calls the Jews “this people,” not “my people:” they had delighted to wander into idolatry and iniquity; and they did not refrain their feet from walking in those evil ways, either from fear or love of God. He therefore declared, that he no longer accepted them; but was determined to punish them according to their sins, for the honour of his justice and holiness. And he would not allow Jeremiah to pray any more for good to them; (Notes, vii. 16. xv. 1—4. Ez. xiv. 13—21;) nor would their fastings, prayers, and sacrifices, in which it is probable they were then engaged, prevent still heavier vengeance from falling on them: for “these were but the beginning of sorrows,” which with combined destructions would entirely desolate the land. (Notes, xxxvi. 8—25. Is. i. 10—20. lviii. 1—7. Joel ii. 12—20.)

V. 13—16. The prophet could not but allow the justice of the Lord’s controversy with the people: yet he was desirous of finding something to plead in their behalf. He thought that the false prophets were the principal criminals; for they flattered the people with assurances of peace and prosperity, and set them against the faithful warnings of the true prophets. This the Lord allowed to be the case; and with great severity gave sentence against the prophets also: but as “the people loved to have it so,” (Notes, 10—12. v. 30, 31,) they were not to be excused, or to escape: for judgments, corresponding to their enormous wickedness, were about to be poured out on them.—The many energetick words, which are used in describing the conduct of the false prophets, and the Lord’s indignation both against them and the people, are peculiarly suitable to the occasion, and calculated to lay hold on the reader’s attention. (Notes, iv. 10. viii. 1—3. xxiii. 9—32. xxvi. 9. xxvii. 12—15. xxviii. Is. xxx. 8—11. Mic. ii. 6—12. Matt. vii. 15—20. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. 2 Pet. ii. 1—3. Rev. xix. 17—21, v. 20.)

V. 17, 18. The Lord next ordered his servant to declare before the people his determination, to give a loose to incessant and excessive grief, in the prospect of those miseries, which he could not prevent, either by his warnings or prayers. The Jews endured great distress from famine; but far greater calamities were approaching: and Jerusalem would be broken in a more grievous manner than she had ever before been. Then, in the field would be seen those who had been slain by the Chaldean besiegers; and in the city such as were dying of famine: even the priests and prophets would attempt to flee into foreign lands for safety; and such as remained would be carried away captive. (Notes, Lam. i. 12—17. iv. 7—16.) The last clause may be rendered; "Because both the prophet and the priest carry on a trade against the land, and they acknowledge it not." (Marg.) "For filthy lucre's sake," they deceived the people with lying divinations, and promised them peace: yet, when charged with it, they would not own their guilt and seek forgiveness. Or, intent on their own gain, they disregarded the miseries of the people.

They know not. (18) The verb (יָדָע), here translated know, is rendered acknowledge in the twentieth verse.

V. 19—22. The prophet still pleaded for a mitigation of the sentence. Had the Lord utterly cast off Judah, his visible church, in which the promised Messiah was to be raised up? Did he abhor Zion, the place of his temple and worship, and the type of good things to come? And would he no longer have a church on earth? If this were not his purpose, wherefore did he so smite them that there was no healing? None else could, and he would not, heal them: and all their expectations of deliverance and peace were frustrated. (Notes, 7—9. viii. 14—16.)—He then acknowledged his own sins, and those of his people: but he still prayed that the Lord would not abhor them, for the honour of his great name. The temple, in which he manifested his special presence above the mercy-seat, was "the throne of his glory" on earth; which would be disgraced, if profaned by the heathen: and he pleaded with the LORD, (Notes, vii. 3—16. xvii. 12, 13,) that he would remember his covenant and not disannul it. The people had, indeed, violated their national covenant; and forfeited the covenanted blessings: yet Jeremiah prayed that it might not wholly be made void, and of no effect: (Note, Ps. lxxiv. 20:) for that is the proper meaning of the word, rendered "break."—Even in their present distress, none of the idols of the gentiles could help them, nor could the heavens give rain of themselves: they had none to apply to but the LORD; and on him they waited for relief, as the omnipotent Creator and Governor of all things. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, x. 12—15. 1 Kings xvii. 1. xviii. 1, 2. 41—44. Zech. x. 1. Acts xiv. 11—18, v. 17.)—"He teacheth the church a form of prayer, to humble themselves to God by true repentance, which is 'the only mean to avoid this famine.' (Notes, Is. lxiii. 15—19. lxiv.)—Though most of the people were either hypocrites or idolaters; yet a small remnant of believers may be supposed to have joined the prophet in their prayers: and probably they prevailed for the removal of the famine, though not for the prevention of the captivity. (Note, xv. 1.)—"The Hebrew word Hu, "He," is often equivalent to the true or eternal God. See Deut. xxxii. 39. Is. xliii. 10. 13. xlviii. 12; and especially Ps. cii. 27, where the expression is the same as that of the text, ... "Thou art He:" our English reads, "Thou art the same." Lowth.—The apostle applies this to our Saviour. (Notes, Ps. cii. 25—28. Heb. i. 10—12. xiii. 7, 8.)—Break not, &c. (21) "Annul not thy covenant with us." Blayney.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Our entire dependence on God is manifest in every thing: if he withholds the showers of rain; the fields no longer yield their increase, the springs of water fail, tillage ceases, flourishing cities languish, and the inhabitants wax pale, faint, and die: and should he continue this sore judgment, the earth, with all its proudest and wealthiest possessors, as well as the poor and mean, must at length perish.—When man's iniquity has provoked the Lord thus to visit any land, the inhabitants often lament their miseries, without any due regard to him, or humiliation for their sins; and they express their anguish in much the same way as the innocent animals do, which are involved in their punishment; except that their complaints are rebellious as well as bitter. And often, when fasts are proclaimed, and formal confessions and supplications made before God; the insincerity of those concerned is demonstrated, by the want of "fruits meet for repentance;" and then such hypocritical cries are disregarded and rejected.—Whatever men trust to, whilst they neglect God, and his service and salvation, it will finally disappoint them: they will return from their broken cisterns "with their vessels empty, and "ashamed" of their confidence: (Note, ii. 13:) nor will industry and ingenuity stand in any more stead, than nobility and affluence, when God arises to execute vengeance. But they who make "the Hope of Israel" their confidence, will find him a present Saviour in every time of trouble, 'in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.' And though our manifold "iniquities testify against us, and our backslidings have been many:" yet, if we now return to the Lord, by sincere repentance, faith, and prayer, he will save us, "to the praise of the glory of his grace." Such genuine converts long for the salvation of their neighbours and relatives, and interest themselves in the concerns of the church: and they are sometimes more troubled for the miseries which oppress or await others, than for their own share in temporal calamities.

CHAP. XV.

God determines, (let who will intercede,) to pour out many heavy judgments on the Jews, 1—9. Jeremiah complains that he is generally hated; and God promises good to him amidst the calamities of the nation, 10—14. The prophet professes his integrity, and renews his complaints, 15—18. God recalls him to his work, and promises to support and deliver him in the due discharge of it, 19—21 ties. They therefore supplicate their reconciled God in behalf of all connected with them, for their native country, and that part of the church especially to which they belong. Here also the mercy of God, and the honour of his name, supply many a plea to urge before him, in behalf of the very persons, whose "iniquities testify against them:" for "the Hope and Saviour of Israel" will return to deliver those communities, in which a considerable remnant of true believers are found; though otherwise justly deserving of his severest vengeance. But when "the faithful fail," and the measure of iniquity is filled up, God will certainly estrange himself from those, who have been most favoured with the means of grace; and his glory will require that they be more severely punished, than less enlightened communities.—He can silence the blasphemies of his enemies, when he sees good thus to punish those "who are called by his name;" and shew that he knows how, and is able, to deliver them when he pleases, though for a time he leave them to suffer for their iniquities. And when he sheweth his servants how they, for whom they plead, "love to wander," and do not refrain their feet from any evil way; they will be constrained to allow the justice of his most awful dispensations.

V. 13—22.

False teachers, who have always abounded in the visible church, are of all characters the most criminal: for they speak lies in the name of God; and, by teaching the people false doctrine and "the deceit of their hearts," they encourage men to expect peace and salvation, without repentance, faith, conversion, and holiness of life. (Note, Ez. xiii. 10—23. P. O. 1—23.) Thus a large proportion of the guilt and misery of mankind will be charged to their account; and inevitable and tremendous destruction will overwhelm them. But, as the hatred of truth and holiness, and the love of sin, dispose men to prefer such ministers of Satan to the faithful servants of God; they, who are thus given up to "a strong delusion to believe a lie," will not be allowed to plead this for an excuse, when the Lord shall "pour their wickedness upon them." He is righteous in these judgments: yet it behoves us to mourn over the miseries of the human race; for the law that commands us to love our neighbour as ourselves, is our rule of conduct: which his unrevealed, or even revealed purposes could not be. And when we consider, how "evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," to the temporal ruin of nations and churches, and the destruction of innumerable immortal souls; "our eyes" might well "run down with tears night and day, and not cease:" and we should more frequently be thus affected, if that mind were in us, which was in him, who wept over Jerusalem, and prayed on the cross for his persecutors. Yet we need not fear lest the Lord should utterly reject his church, or abhor his ordinances: he will always have a people to commune with him at his mercy-seat, and never suffer that "throne of his glory" to be disgraced, or abrogate his covenant with the great Redeemer. Though he may smite, and not heal, professing nations and hypocrites; yet he will bind up the wounded conscience of every true penitent, and heal the stripes which he inflicts on his believing people: and if he should not see good to hear our prayers in behalf of our guilty land; yet he will certainly bless, with temporal and eternal salvation, all who confess their sins before him, and wait on him for his promised mercy.—In the case of drought, what unbelievers and philosophers call nature, can no more give showers, than the idols of the heathen could. 'On the contrary, God directs them when and where they shall fall.' Lowth. (Notes, Job v. 8—10. xxxvii. 1—13. Ps. cxxxv. 7.) Thus "every good and perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning:" (Notes, Jam. i. 16—18:) and in him alone must we trust, on him alone must we wait, for all things pertaining to this life, and to that which is to come.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1. The prophet still continued importunately to pray for his people; but the Lord had determined not to grant his requests in this particular: yet, in order to reconcile his mind to this refusal, he declared that even Moses and Samuel must plead in vain in the present case. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. xxxii. 11—14. Num. xiv. 13—19. 1 Sam. vii. 9. Ps. xcix. 6—8. Ez. xiv. 13—21.) They had separately, and repeatedly, prevailed with him to pardon his offending people, when they lived on earth; and were most eminent among his servants: but if both of them could unite to intercede for Israel at this time, the mind, or favourable regard, of God could not be towards them; their crimes were so enormous, and their habits of rebellion so inveterate. He had therefore given orders for them to be cast out of the land; for he could no longer endure them in his sight. (Note, xiv. 19—22.)—This passage fully proves that departed saints do not intercede for us; for it evidently implies, that Moses and Samuel did not then stand before the Lord, in behalf of Israel, or of any in Israel.

appointed to different kinds of misery, by the righteous judgment of God: and this decision was notified to them that they might see to what straits their sins had reduced them. Rev. vi. 8;) and the sword and famine would destroy the most of them; and a few would be reserved for captivity. Whilst the sword of the enemy would cut off very great numbers, their dead bodies would be left unburied to be devoured by dogs, and by birds and beasts of prey; and the survivors would be subjected to fierce and cruel oppressors. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 25, 26.) More tremendous words, as to this world, can scarcely be conceived. (Notes, Ez. v. 1—12. Am. v. 18—20. ix. 1—4.) Their remnant would be removed into the most distant regions; because of their willing concurrence, and impenitent continuance, in the idolatries and iniquities of Manasseh, notwithstanding all the methods afterwards used to reclaim them. (Notes, 2 Kings xxi. 1—18. xxiii. 26, 27. xxiv. 3, 4.) ‘The word’ (rendered “to be removed,”) ‘signifieth to run to and fro, for fear and ‘unquietness of conscience, as did Cain.’

See xxii. 8, 9. ‘Who will be so much concerned for thee, as to step a ‘little out of his way to enquire after thee? ... Rather they ‘that pass by will insult over thy calamities.’ Lowth. (Notes, xl. 2, 3. Deut. xxix. 21—25. Lam. iv. 13—16.)

V. 6. Marg. Ref.—I am, &c.] The Lord had often threatened to execute judgment on the people; but he had spared them on repentance, and in answer to the prayers of his servants: thus he was said to repent of the evil, which he said he would do unto them. (Notes, iv. 28, 29. xviii. 7—10. Gen. vi. 6, 7.) But, as they continually relapsed into idolatry, his patience was, as it were, worn out, and he was “weary of repenting:” that is, it was highly proper for him to take vengeance on them. (Note, Is. xliii. 22—25.)

V, 7. The nation in general was become as chaff: and therefore the Lord would drive them by his judgments from the gates of their cities all over the land; as the fan drives away the chaff. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, iv. 11—13. li. 2. Is. xxx. 27, 28. xli. 15, 16.)

V. 8, 9. The immense slaughter made by the victorious enemy, and by other judgments, would leave great numbers of widows, who would have none but God to take care of them; thus they would be increased “to Him:” for the future is spoken of, as if it were already arrived. The Lord was about to bring upon Jerusalem, (the mother-city, or metropolis of Judah, Is. l. 1,) a young man, a spoiler at noon-day, who would plunder openly by force, and not secretly by fraud, or, against the mother and the young men her children. (Marg.) Nebuchadnezzar was the spoiler intended: he was a young man when he took Jerusalem; (Note, xxv. 1;) and he suddenly fell on the city, and filled it with terrors and miseries. Then the populous city was made desolate: the mothers who had brought up many children, were broken hearted with grief, at hearing that they were all slain: Jerusalem’s honour and prosperity terminated unexpectedly, as if the sun should set before the time: (Note, Am. viii. 4—6, v. 9;) and the remnant of her inhabitants were given up to be slain or enslaved by the conqueror at his pleasure.

ent with still severer denunciations of vengeance. This he knew would expose him to their more violent resentment; and therefore he lamented that his mother ever bare him, to be a man of strife and contention to the whole land. For he was doomed to spend his life in contending against the sins of the people, and the delusions of the false prophets; and to be treated as a contentious, malevolent, and mischievous person for so doing. He had neither borrowed nor lent money, in an usurious manner, which practices especially rendered men odious: (Notes, x. xxii. 25—27. Neh. v. 1—13:) he gave no umbrage and did no injury in secular concerns, which are common grounds of contention: and yet he was more generally hated and cursed, than any fraudulent debtor or oppressing creditor.—His trials were doubtless great: yet there was much infirmity in these passionate complaints. (Notes, i. 18—23.)—‘I am an object of the common hatred: every body takes occasion to quarrel with me; because I speak such truths as they do not care to hear.’ Lowth.—‘He sheweth what is the condition of God’s ministers; to wit, to have all the world against them, though they give none occasion.’

V. 11. In order to calm the ruffled spirit of his servant, the Lord graciously engaged that it should be “well with his remnant:” either with him, for the remnant of his days; or with the remnant of the people, who attended his word and joined in his prayers, or “I will give thee happy deliverance.” Lowth. He should be supported and comforted under all troubles, and all should terminate happily: and the enemy would treat him with kindness, whilst his opposers were overwhelmed with calamities. All their treasures would certainly be given to these spoilers, without any possibility of prevailing with them by price to depart from them; or, without any price received by the Lord for his worshippers, as sold into slavery; (Note, Ps. xlv. 9—16, v. 12;) and they would be carried away into the land of their enemies, for the sins committed in every part of the country. (Note, xvii. 3, 4.)—‘The opposition, which the Jews make against thee, shall easily be vanquished and disappointed: because “I am with thee, &c.”’ Lowth. (Note, 19—21.) The twelfth verse may be thus applied to the prophet’s case: but the interpretation, which Blayney endeavours to establish, as if the whole passage was a menace against the prophet personally for his impatience, appears to me completely unnatural; and the last clause, “which shall burn upon you,” (plur.) sufficiently proves that the people were intended, and not the prophet. (Marg. Ref.—Note, xx. 1—6.)

V. 15—18. The prophet still found his mind greatly discomposed, so that he opened his case before God, with a considerable degree of impatience, and some peevish expressions. He was sensible that the Lord knew his integrity, his circumstances, and his enemies: he intreated him to remember and visit him with mercy, and to revenge his cause; and not to take him away, while he exercised his long-suffering towards his persecutors, seeing that he was hated and reproached for his sake.—‘Suffer not mine enemies to take away my life while thou forbearest to vindicate and defend me. Verbs active, in the Hebrew language, do often signify only permission.’ Lowth.—The prophet had “found the word” of God as

He had withdrawn himself from all intercourse with the profane, scornful, and jovial; and had not frequented their revels, nor shared in their mirth, but had lived in retirement: (Note, Lam. iii. 26—30:) and the awful predictions, with which he had been charged, the impenitence and opposition of the people, and the trials allotted him, had marred all his joy, and filled him with terror, sorrow, and melancholy; because of the Lord's indignation with his people, and their indignation at him. But on what account was his pain thus made perpetual? Why was he oppressed with grief, which would admit of no remedy? The Lord had promised to deliver him; (Note, i. 17—19;) and would he act after the manner of deceitful men? V. 19—21. The prophet was out of temper, and heartless about his ministry; and in a frame of mind, which may best be understood by those, who have been tried a little in the same way. But the Lord called him to repent of his impatience, and to return to his work. In this case he would again employ and honour him; he would bring him out of his difficulties, and cause him to stand with acceptance before him. And, if he learned to distinguish between "the precious and the vile," especially in respect of the characters of the people; that he might address them severally, for reproof, conviction, instruction, or consolation; (Notes, Ez. xxii. 26. xliv. 7—9. 23, 24;) then the Lord would use him as his mouth, to declare his will, and would certainly take care of him in all respects. But he must go on steadily in his prophetic office, using every means to bring the people to return to him, as their prophet, and to obey the word of the Lord spoken by him; and in case they would not, to leave the matter with God; but not to go down at all upon their ground, not to vary from his instructions, not to accommodate himself in the least to their wishes, nor to give the least countenance or encouragement to them in their sins, either by his doctrine or example. If he attended to these things he might be assured that the Lord would perform the promises before made to him, and deliver him from the most powerful and malicious of his enemies. (Note, i. 17—19.)

If thou take forth, &c. (19) 'To "separate the precious from the vile," means to teach sound doctrine distinguishing rightly between what is good and what is otherwise; which is the characteristick of a true minister of God.' Blayney.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The holy God so abhors all sin, and his honour is so engaged to punish it; that it is absolutely impossible his "heart can be towards" obstinate and impenitent transgressors: and if the prayers, even of his most eminent servants, for the wicked, are not answered by their conversion; they cannot avail for their deliverance from deserved misery: nor can any thing rescue guilty nations from divine judgments, except as it conduces to their reformation.—Whilst we remain on earth, we ought to persevere in prayer for our unconverted relations and connexions: but "the spirits of just men made perfect" would not, if they might, say a word in behalf of any, for whom the heavenly Advocate does not intercede; and his intercession suffices for "all that come to God through him."—Dreadful will be the case of all those, whom the Lord finally rejects and abhors. The variety of temporal calamities which he inflicts on guilty nations; the wars, famines, and pestilences which waste them; the imprisonment and slavery, loss of children and other near relatives; the terror, anguish, and pain, to which numbers are exposed, are no more than earnest of the wrath to come, which awaits all impenitent workers of iniquity.—Bad examples, and abused influence, authority, and talents, often produce fatal effects after men are dead: this may be the case even with those who live to repent, and so escape the most dreadful personal consequences of their crimes; which shews us how important it is to begin early to serve the Lord. These things, however, are no more than occasions to men's sins, which originate from the evil of their own hearts; and therefore they justly deserve punishment: yet we should greatly dread being the guilty, or even the innocent, occasions of it.—We ought, while here, to compassionate and bemo-those who suffer for their sins, and interest ourselves in their concerns: but the wicked will perish unpitied and unlamented, when God shall stretch forth his hand against them to destroy them; because their obstinate impenitence has wearied out his patience.

V. 10—21.

The ministers of God are constrained to “declare his whole counsel,” though the proud and powerful be exasperated: and, however upright, prudent, blameless, and benevolent their conduct may be; however they avoid being entangled with the affairs of this life, and “abstain from all appearance of evil;” so long as they contend against sin and error, they will be deemed “pestilent fellows,” “troublers of the city,” and men of strife and contention. But, as prophets and apostles, and even Christ himself, were thus hated, reviled, and execrated by the ungodly: instead of complaining that we are exposed to such treatment, we should rejoice and be “exceedingly glad,” that we are conformed to such honourable patterns, and because “our reward is great in heaven.” (Notes, Matt. 10—12. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.) Yet in such circumstances, unbelief and impatience are often excited, and ruffle our tempers, cloud our judgments, and suggest highly improper thoughts and words. But our gracious Lord will tenderly bear with the infirmities of his upright servants, and give them proper encouragement: and assuredly “it will be well” in life and death, with all the remnant of true believers; whilst all their obstinate opponents will be consumed by the fire which the Lord has kindled in his anger; and the stoutest and proudest of them will be utterly unable to withstand him, or “the weapons of his indignation.”—We should acquiesce in the judgments

God on his enemies, and rejoice in his knowledge of and of all our trials; and we should beseech him to remember and visit our souls with his salvation, and to preserve us from our persecutors. When we are conscious that we are rebuked for his sake, we may plead that as a reason why he should interpose in our behalf; but we should pray for the conversion of our persecutors, and not be avenged of them.—Happy are they, who seek and hold the words of the Lord; who can relish and feed on them in their hearts, by faith, prayer, and meditation; and who can truly say, that they are “the joy and rejoicing” of their souls: such are justly called by the name of the Lord, and they will have pleasant employment for their retired hours. Indeed, we all ought to avoid the assembly of the mockers, and the sensual and dissipated pleasures of the ungodly; and court retirement for searching the scriptures, for meditation, and prayer: (Note, Ps. i. 1—3:) yet, while suitably affected with the calamities of the church and of the world, and mourning for our own sins and sorrows; we should not indulge melancholy or moroseness, or exclude ourselves wholly from society; lest we grow fretful, impatient, and unfit for our duty. Even in complaining to God, we are prone to give place to unholy tempers, and to use distrustful and irreverent expressions: as if our griefs were unnecessary, intolerable, or incurable; or as if he disappointed our expectations, grounded on his faithful word. Thus we dishonour him and disquiet ourselves; and he might justly leave us to the effects of our sin and folly: but he bears with us, and checks the progress of our evil tempers. We cannot, however, expect the comfort or credit of his favour and service, except in the exercise of faith, submission, and diligence in our work: and to stand accepted with him is an abundant recompence for all, which we can do or suffer for his sake.—They, who are employed as his mouth, must learn to distinguish the precious from the vile, in doctrines, practice, experience, and characters; that they may be “workmen, who need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.” (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 14—18, v. 15.) They must endeavour to reduce their hearers to the scriptural standard of faith and holiness: but they must by no means lower the requirements of scripture; accommodate their message to the humours, sentiments, fashions, or characters of men; or teach them to seek safety and happiness in any other way, than that laid down in the gospel. When they strictly adhere to this plan, they may be sure that the Lord will protect, uphold, comfort, and prosper them; and they will assuredly prevail against every terrible and wicked opposer: but those who are men-pleasers cannot be the servants of Jesus Christ, but will at length be put to shame and perish. (Notes, Gal. i. 6—10. 1 Thes. ii. 1—8, v. 4.)

Luke xxiii. 26—31.)—The prophet was therefore forbidden to marry, and required to make the prohibition known; in order the more forcibly to impress the minds of the people, with the apprehension of the reality and near approach of the tremendous judgments which he had predicted. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, viii. 1—3. xv. 2—4.) The time was at hand, when the most endeared relations would be an additional cause of anguish and misery: and to manifest his assured belief of this, the prophet was required to remain unmarried, that he might be less encumbered and more prepared for days of distress. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, 1 Cor. vii. 6—9. 25—28.)

V. 5—7. The best comment on these verses might be found, in an authentick and full narrative of what takes place, when dire pestilence baffles all efforts to restrain it, in any city or district. So far from the customary funeral-rites being attended to; it often happens, that houses are deserted, where the dead, nay the dying remain; who are not found for some time, and then in circumstances too horrid to be described.—Several of these customary tokens of mourning were prohibited by the law. (xli. 4, 5. Notes, Lev. xix. 27—29. xxi. 1—5. Deut. xiv. 1, 2. Ez. xxiv. 16—24. xlv. 25—27. Matt. ix. 18—26, v. 23. Mark v. 35—43, vv. 38, 39.)

for that purpose, we may learn from John xi. 19) easily concluding, that a person so far swallowed up of grief, as even to forget his own bread, could hardly attend to the entertainment of so many guests, each sent in his proportion of meat and drink, in hopes to prevail upon the mourner by their example and persuasions to partake of such refreshments, as might tend to recruit both his bodily strength and spirits.' Blayney. (Note, John xi. 17—19.)

V. 8, 9. (Note, xv. 15—18.) Fasting and mourning for sin were more seasonable, in the present circumstances of Israel, than any kind of mirth or pleasure. (Notes, Ec. ii. 1—11 v. 4. Is. xxii. 8—14. Matt. ix. 14, 15. xi. 16—19.)—"In your eyes, and in your days:" this clearly shewed that the predicted miseries would no longer be delayed (Notes, vii. 32—34. xxv. 10. Ez. xii. 21—25.)

V. 10—12. 'Because the wicked ... dissemble their own sins, and murmur against God's judgments, as though he had no just cause to punish them; he sheweth the prophet what to answer.'—It is worthy of remark, how much the spirit of self vindication appeared in the Jews even in the most atrociously idolatrous and wicked state of the nation at this period. Several times already we have seen the traces of it in this prophecy. (Notes, ii. 22—24. 33—37.) It is inherent in human nature, and no enormity or actual guilt will subdue or silence it.—The iniquities of the fathers are punished on the children; because in general, bad education, bad examples, and false principles lead children to imitate, and even to exceed, the wickedness of their fathers: (Notes, xxxi. 29, 30. Ex. xx. 5. Ez. xvii. 2—4. 19, 20:) but it is here intimated, that had not the generation of Israel copied the crimes of their ancestors, and grown worse than they, the threatened judgment would not have been poured out on them, and "in the days;" as the measure of national guilt, would not have been filled up. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 29—33, v. 32.)

^y vii. 15. xv. 4. 13 Therefore ^z will I cast you out of this land ^a into a land that ye know not, neither ye nor your fathers; ^b and there shall ye serve other gods day and night, where I will not shew you favour.

^e xxv. 9. Am. iv. 2. Hab. i. 14, 15. 16 ¶ Behold, ^e I will send for many fishers, saith the LORD, and they shall fish them; and after will I send for many ^f hunters, and they shall hunt them, from ^g every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks.

V. 13. Serve other gods, &c.] ‘Mr. Mede expounds ‘the words, of their serving other gods in a political sense; ‘that is, serving those nations who worshipped other gods. ‘...The Chaldee paraphrase explains the phrase to the ‘same purpose, ‘Ye shall serve those people that worship ‘‘idols day and night.’’ Lowth.—It is, however, probable, that most of the Jews were on some occasions seduced, or terrified, into conformity to the idolatry of the victors: (Notes, Dan. iii. 8—18:) and many of them might be incorporated among the idolaters; though the nation in general was by the captivity freed from gross idolatry and set against it. (Notes, Deut. iv. 26—28. xxviii. 36. 64. Ps. lxxxii. 11—13.)—The last clause is by some rendered, “So ‘long as I shall not have given them grace.” (Note, xxxii. 39—41.)

V. 14, 15. “Therefore,” or, “surely, the days come,” &c.—The same particle is rendered “surely,” v. 2: and that construction suits this place.—Intimations of mercy in reserve for the Jews, were given in the midst of the denunciations of vengeance; for the support of the pious remnant, and to encourage repentance. The restoration from the Babylonish captivity, as the more recent mercy, and in every respect interesting and remarkable, would be more remembered than their ancient deliverance from Egypt: it was also typical of spiritual redemption, and of the future deliverance of the church from Antichristian oppression. But the gathering both of the Jews and Israelites from their present dispersions, their conversion to Christianity, and their restoration to their own land, seem also to be predicted. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, xxiii. 7, 8.)

(Notes, xvii. 15—18, v. 18. Is. xl. 1, 2.)—Their idols, or the sacrifices, especially those of their sons and daughters, which they offered to idols, are called the carcasses of their abominable things; and with these they had defiled that land, which belonged to JEHOVAH as his chosen inheritance. (Notes, iii. 6—11. Lev. xviii. 24—30. xxvi. 30. Ez. xliii. 7—9.)

He had revealed to his other prophets, and to him, that he would assuredly call the Gentiles from all the ends of the earth; when they would renounce the idolatry of their fathers, as unprofitable lies and vanity, to worship the God of Israel.—The fact, now undeniable, that the Gentiles, through so large a part of the world, have actually renounced their idols, to worship, in profession at least, the God of Israel, (that despised nation,) is most wonderful, when compared with the state of things at the time, when Jeremiah wrote this most remarkable prediction. (Note, Zech. viii. 20—23.)—And should not Israel be previously convinced of the folly and wickedness of making gods for themselves, which were no gods, but the cause of all their miseries? “Shall man” (Adam) “make to himself gods?” (ELOHIM.)—God (ELOHIM) at first created Adam, and in him all mankind: how senseless then, as well as abominable, for man to attempt making god, that is, an object of his own adoration and confidence! ‘Shall that power, which is finite and weak, take upon him to make that which is infinite?’ Bp. Hall. (Notes, x. 2—15. Is. xlv. 9—11.) Because of this abominable folly and impiety, the Lord determined, that he would by this one proof of his power and might, in the Babylonish captivity and the deliverance of the Jews from it, make them to know his name and effectually set them against idolatry.—Yet the calling of the Gentiles, of which some understand “this one time,” was, and the future conversion of all Israel to Christianity, and restoration to their own land, will be, far more effectual for the destruction of idolatry, than any preceding events ever were. ‘The time alluded to is undoubtedly that, when the gospel was to be preached to and embraced by the Gentiles. ... “They shall know that my name is JEHOVAH,” a name which implies absolute and necessary existence, the real source and origin of all perfection; and they shall know it by the blessings, which shall from my providence be derived to them.’ Blayney. (Note, Ex. iii. 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God have continual occasion for self-denial in their implicit obedience: and he may very properly require them to forego the most innocent comforts of life, for his glory, and to render them instructive examples to the people. For he can make them more easy and satisfied in the situation allotted, than they who are not bound by such restrictions can imagine.—None can be sure, that if they had children, or if their children were continued to them, they would add to their comfort; and many events may take place, which might cause them to wish that their children had never been born, or that they had died in their infancy: so that entire resignation to the will of God, in all these matters, is our only wisdom.—Peace, inward and outward, domestick and publick, is wholly the work and gift of God, the result of his “loving-kindness and tender mercy:” and when he takes his peace from any people, every kind of confusion and distress must follow.—There may be circumstances, in which it may be proper to avoid those things, which at other times are a part of prophet prays for comfort and salvation; complains of ill usage; protests his fidelity and love to the people; and calls for vengeance on his persecutors, 14—18. A message to the rulers concerning hallowing the sabbath, with conditional promises and threatenings, 19—27.

our duty. In general it is good to go to the house of mourning; both in order to learn profitable lessons, and that we may counsel and comfort the afflicted, and give a religious direction to their sorrows. (Note, Ec. vii. 2—6.) Yet times of publick calamity may render all private regards unseasonable: and it behoves the servants of God by every means to shew their abhorrence of sin, and their apprehension of the divine indignation against impenitent transgressors. But it is far more generally expedient for them to withdraw from the house of feasting: especially when the Lord calls his people to mourn and sigh, for the abominations and miseries which they witness. And indeed we should all sit loose to the pleasures and concerns of this life: for carnal mirth, yea, the most allowable causes of joy, will soon cease from impenitent sinners, or be turned into “weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth.”—We cannot silence the objections of unhumiliated sinners; they will persist in justifying and excusing themselves, and declaiming against the dispensations and threatenings of God, as unmerited and severe. But he will shortly shew them and all the world, their iniquities: for “his eyes are upon them;” none of their sins, or the aggravations of them, are hid from him: and then they will no more be able to object to the justice of their sentence, than to elude or resist the executioners of it; “for every mouth shall be stopped, and all the world shall be found guilty before God.” Thus will he recompense the sins of the impenitent on their own heads; but he will also exercise mercy to thousands and tens of thousands. Every publick calamity shall promote the purity of his church; every personal affliction, the sanctification of the true believer: succeeding remarkable interpositions in behalf of his people shall eclipse those which have preceded; till “the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved.” The nations have often known the power of JEHOVAH in his indignation; but they shall at length know his name, as “the Strength and Fortress” of his people, and their “Refuge in the time of trouble.”—When sinners truly repent, they renounce the vain practices “delivered to them by tradition from their fathers;” and are not content with unprofitable vanity and lies, because these were the portion of their progenitors. (Note and P. O. 1 Pet. i. 17—21.) And these are indeed the only portion of all, who do not come to the LORD, renouncing all for his sake, accepting of his salvation, and devoting themselves to his worship and service.

8 For ^t he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green ; and shall not be careful in the year of ^u drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit.

“ten with a pen of iron,” or an engraving instrument, and “with the point of a diamond ;” which were employed to make the most durable inscriptions on the hardest substances. (Notes, Job xix. 23—27, vv. 23, 24. Is. viii. 1—4, v. 1. xxx. 8—11, v. 8.) Their attachment to idolatry was so engraven on their hearts, that it could not be erased ; (Notes, xxxi. 31—34. Prov. vii. 3. 2 Cor. iii. 1—3 ;) and it was written in legible characters on the horns of the altars, which they dedicated to idols. Perhaps the name of the idol, and of him who erected the altar, used to be inscribed on its horns.—Their children were early initiated in these abominations ; (Note, vii. 17, 18 ;) and would be sure to remember their altars and groves as long as they lived : and thus idolatry was delivered down to succeeding generations.—“This was indeed inverting the rule, which Moses had prescribed to them, in order to secure the observance of God’s law. ... Deut. xi. 18—20.” Blayney.

V. 3, 4. Zion, “the mountain of the LORD’s house,” may here be addressed.—The city itself is elsewhere called “the valley, and the rock of the plain,” (Note, xxi. 13, 14 ;) for it was surrounded with hills : but the whole together constituted “a mountain,” and the adjacent country, “a field” in which it stood.—This was sentenced to be plundered by the Chaldeans ; and Judah himself, (or the nation of the Jews,) should be dispossessed, for a long time, of the inheritance which God had given him, and reduced to slavery in a foreign country : and the anger of God against their sins would burn like fire perpetually, nay for ever, against the impenitent. (Note, xv. 12—14.)—The word discontinue seems to refer to the sabbatical years : as these had long been neglected, the Lord determined to give rest to the land by the destruction or captivity of the inhabitants.—“O my mountain, thy substance in the field, and all thy stores will I give up to pillage : thy strong holds, because of sin :” Blayney : connecting “in the field,” with “substance,” and not with “mountain.”

V. 5—8. The Jews were always prone to trust in powerful allies, or in their own strength ; which emboldened them to disregard God and his denunciations of vengeance.

(Notes, ii. 33—37. xxii. 20—23. Is. xxx. 1—7. xxxi. 1—5. Ez. xxix. 6, 7.) A dreadful curse is therefore here pronounced against every one, who “trusted in man.” (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3—5.)—To expect safety, prosperity, or happiness, from any man, or number of men ; to rely on their power, wealth, wisdom, valour, favour, and fidelity ; and thus to neglect the promises, precepts, and ordinances of God ; and to bestow more pains to obtain the patronage and protection of man, than the divine favour ; as if a powerful prince could render that man happy, who has God for his enemy : by these things, and such as these, men “make flesh their arm ;” and put a poor, frail, dying, sinful creature, in the place of the almighty and everlasting Protector and Helper. In so doing “the heart departeth from the LORD,” and renounces its reliance on him. And, as trusting in other men idolizes them ; so reliance on our own capacity, knowledge, wisdom, strength, or righteousness, idolizes ourselves : and when this is habitual, it subjects a man to the curse here denounced. (Note, ix. 23, 24.) A person of this character resembles the “heath,” a sorry, worthless shrub, which grows in the barren desert, and withers for want of moisture ; (Marg. Ref. p ;) and whilst other plants, in more fertile soils, flourish by seasonable showers, this still continues the same, as doomed to grow in its native heartless soil. Thus he, “who trusts in man,” can never share the prosperity of God’s people : he must remain destitute of divine grace, unfruitful, unholy, and worthless ; frustrated of all his expectations, liable to be deprived of all comfort, exposed to all misery, and excluded from the presence and favour of God, to inhabit the land where sin and sorrow dwell for ever.—But he who trusts in the Lord, and expects every blessing from his mercy, grace, and providence, according to his word, is a happy man : he resembles a tree planted in a fertile soil, on the bank of a river, which is not affected by heat or drought ; but is covered with verdant leaves, and continues to bear fruit in the most unfavourable seasons. His profession and prosperity are permanent ; he remains safe in every difficulty, and needs not fear any event ; for he shall not cease from bringing forth the fruits of righteousness.
